Two loaves of excellent home-made beet sugar having been presented to the emperor, he gave the subject of its production as much thought and study as he could amid his incessant and gigantic cares, and decreed (March 25, 1811) that 30,000 hectares (nearly 80,000 acres) of land should be devoted to the culture of the beet, and a considerable sum was confided to the minister of agriculture expressly to encourage the production of beet sugar. Coincident instructions were dispatched to the prefects of the several departments into which France was divided, and a subsequent decree, issued January 15, 1812, established five schools of chemistry in aid of the manufacture of beet sugar; while four imperial factories were provided, calculated to produce from the crop of 1812 2,000,000 kilograms (nearly 5,000,000 pounds) of beet sugar.

In 1868 Hon. Horace Capron, Commissioner of Agriculture, in a report to this House upon this subject, says:

Without Government encouragement at the outset it might not now be numbered among the industries that bless the world. When the first Bonaparte fostered the art of extracting sugar from this garden vegetable as a practical matter, the possibility of obtaining a good article had long previously been demonstrated by chemists; it only remained to be shown that the manufacture could be conducted with profit on a large scale. His object was to exclude from his empire the sugar of British colonies, the price of which was then four or five francs per pound. A prize of one million francs was offered by the French Government for the most successful method of obtaining a supply of indigenous sugar. It was soon evident that such a supply must be furnished by the beet.

By a reference to dates it will be seen that these unsuccessful experiments in obtaining sugar from the beet extended through a period of sixty-five years, when, under the energetic management and liberal encouragement of Napoleon, they at once culminated in success. At that time France did not make a pound of sugar, except in distant colonies; to-day she supplies her thirty-six millions of population and exports nearly a quarter the amount we buy, and every pound from the beet. Napoleon fell, but the beet-sugar industry remains, compared with which his victories in the field sink into utter insignificance. Those victories which at the time electrified the world are now seen to have been wholly ephemeral, inasmuch as the map of Europe has undergone repeated alterations since he established the boundaries of her "principalities and powers."

But his way of doing things may be profitably recalled. When he struck for empire, he massed his columns and won the battle of Arcola, and Italy lay prostrate at his feet. Again he massed his columns and won the battle of Marengo, and Austria ceded to him Piedmont with all her fortresses and confirmed his title to Italy. Not satisfied, he again massed his battalions and won the decisive battle of Austerlitz, and Austria gave to him all her Italian and Adriatic possessions and consented to the dismemberment of the old German Empire and the establishment of the new confederation of the Rhine. In like manner he massed his five schools of chemistry and his four imperial manufactories upon this beet-sugar problem, stimulating investigation by the offer of 100,000,000 francs for success, and success was achieved.

Nature was overcome, and in a new way made to contribute from her exhaustless storehouse for the supply of the wants of man. The beet-sugar industry was no longer an experiment but a fixed fact, and to-day 38 per cent. of the total sugar product of the world is made from the beet. This was the greatest victory Napoleon ever won, and in the long reach of the centuries to come, as industrial problems multiply and industrial pursuits rise to higher honor, the fruits of this victory shall increase; while his victories in the field, not won in the name of liberty or religion or any of the rights of man, but for ambition alone, barren of all fruit yet brilliant in their barrenness, shall be recalled only by the student of history and by those engaged in the profession of arms.

Now, sir, in the light of this bit of history, I repeat the question, What shall we do with this sorghum and maize sugar problem? Give it up, as some counsel? If not, shall we do no more than continue our present half-hearted, some will say economical, policy? or shall we adopt a little of the vigor and liberality which, as we have seen, resulted in a prompt solution of the beet-sugar problem? No single chemist, however constant in labor, sublime in faith, and fertile in resource, can as readily overcome the difficulties of a complete crystallization as if aided by the suggestions of others. No single individual, no matter what his inventive genius may be, can as promptly supply the machinery and appliances requisite to change the juice into sugar as if he had help. And yet we have but one chemist engaged in this work, a work which, if it could promptly result in success, would at once save to the American people in their trade with the world the enormous sum of $79,624,317 annually. And, in the face of these splendid possibilities, the Senate have sent back to this House the agricultural appropriation bill, reducing the appropriations devoted to a continuance of these experiments.

Mr. VALENTINE. I will state for the information of the gentleman that the committee of conference has agreed to restore the appropriation to $25,000. Of course the report has not yet been made.

Mr. GROUT. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a triumph in the right direction.

When we recall the fact that in 1881, the year we paid the above sum for foreign sugars, the total product of our gold and silver mines was $4,424,317 less than the above sum, having been but $75,200,000, and when we remember that unless some new policy is inaugurated this must continue indefinitely in the future, the magnitude of this item and its importance in our commercial calculations must be manifest. And yet at the rate per acre already "actually obtained" of sugar from corn-stalks, namely, 1,059 pounds, a little more than 2¼ per cent. of the corn-stalks which bore the corn crop of the United States for the year 1881, most of which went to waste, if worked into sugar would supply the whole deficiency, and if all the sugar could be separated from the juice it could, beyond all question, be profitably manufactured.

It is simply a question of chemistry—a science yet in its infancy—and chemistry will never surrender to that gummy substance which holds the sugar crystals in solution and prevents a perfect separation, especially when that very substance is the result of her own imperfect work; inasmuch as it is not found in the juice until the introdution of chemical agents for the purposes of defecation. All the sugar particles set free from the juice, and this problem is solved. In this connection let the fact be again recalled that Marggraf and Achard, not conjointly but successively, experimented upon the beet-sugar industry for nearly three-quarters of a century without success, and yet that Napoleon's five schools of chemistry made easy work of it.

Might it not then perhaps be well to re-enforce Professor Collier, who though enthusiastic in this work and confident of ultimate complete success, would naturally increase his own diligence as he saw the Government awaking to the importance of the enterprise. This problem successfully solved, and the enormous sum annually sent to foreign countries for sugar would be kept at home, thus increasing by so much the balance of trade in our favor; and who does not know that so long as we are able to sell more than we buy, and have a balance to our credit, no financial panic can alarm, no financial crisis disturb us. Were this prospective industry successfully established to-day who will calculate its effect upon our financial prosperity not only for the present but down the stretch of the future; and who doubts that if this bill were a law and the department had the rank and authority which justly belong to it, we should be more likely to celebrate the early profitable production of sugar from sorghum and maize than if the department were to remain as it is? The bill provides for a bureau to be made up of divisions of botany, entomology, and chemistry.

If this division of entomology could tell the farmer how to conduct to a successful issue his heretofore unequal contest with the cotton-worm, the Rocky Mountain locust, the grasshopper, the Colorado potato-beetle, the canker-worm, and the myriad other insects inimical to agriculture, it would largely increase the sum total of our agricultural products, and win the lasting gratitude of the country.

It also provides for a bureau of animal industry to be in charge of a competent veterinary surgeon.

The Commissioner of Agriculture in his report of 1878 says that carefully tabulated returns from 1,125 counties out of the 2,447 counties of the United States show a total loss from the disease and death of domestic animals to be $16,653,428—$10,091,483 being from loss of swine alone. He estimates the loss of the whole United States at $30,000,000 annually or more.

In 1881 we exported to foreign markets the product of our domestic animals, not including butter and cheese, a total value of $130,932,743, namely:

Live animals	$16,412,398
Bacon and hams	61,161,205
Fresh beef	9,860,284
Lard	35,226,575
Pork	8,272,285

With this large exportation we cannot afford to let the impression obtain abroad that as a people we are neglectful of those conditions calculated to insure the wholesome character of these products. But the unpleasant fact exists that during the last year loud complaint was made in foreign markets against some of these shipments to the very considerable prejudice of the trade.

In the light of these facts, especially the great annual loss from disease of domestic animals, who would not establish this bureau of animal industry and place at its head the best veterinary surgeon in the country, to be assisted by a corps of competent subordinates?

The bill also provides for a bureau of statistics for the collection of information relative to labor and wages in this and foreign countries, to markets and prices, to modes and cost of transporting agricultural products and live stock to their final market—in short, for the collection of every species of information relative to agriculture and its connection with the trade of the world. Full statistics upon these subjects could not fail to be useful and instructive in many ways. Anti-monopolists tell us that when the farmers of the West raise a crop two or three men meet in New York and agree among themselves what share they will take to move that crop to market, and that from their decision there is no appeal, as indeed there is not, except to the law-making power of the nation.

These statistics will illuminate this and kindred subjects and furnish the requisite information for an intelligent and equitable adjustment between corporate interests and the people, between capital and labor, between the other great industries of the country and the greater industry of agriculture.

In conclusion, let us for a moment inquire whether the proposition contained in this bill to elevate the Department of Agriculture to an Executive Department and give it in charge of a secretary is really a new thing in the history of the world. The fact is there is not one of the great powers of continental Europe but has its minister of agriculture.

In Prussia there are eight secretaries of state, including one for agriculture.

In Austria there are seven secretaries, forming what is called the council of ministers. One is for agriculture.

In Italy there are nine heads of departments; one is the minister of agriculture.

In Spain the council of ministers consists of eight members, one of whom is the minister of agriculture and commerce.

In Russia there are ten secretaries of state. Everything pertaining to agriculture in its broadest sense is in charge of one of these secretaries, who exercises extensive powers.

In France there are nine executive departments. The ministry of agriculture is one of them.

In Brazil, the great South American empire, there is also a minister of agriculture; and, by the way, we go to Brazil for a considerable share of the sugar we import. We paid her in 1881, $5,897,102 for sugar. Who will say that had we a minister of agriculture and our sugar resources were as well cared for as those of Brazil we might not also make sugar to sell instead of buying the enormous quantity already stated.

The fact that in every one of these great powers agriculture is recognized in the administration of its affairs shows that in the estimation of those countries that pursuit sustains such important relations to questions of government that it cannot wisely be left out of its calculations, cannot safely be excluded from its counsels.

Is it replied that ours is a new departure in government and that foreign precedents are not applicable?

Our departure was simply from king-craft and priest-craft, from hereditary titles and rank and the hereditary possession by primogeniture and the entailment of property, to the doctrine that all men are equal before the law and that all political power is vested in the people and that the people shall for themselves choose their own ruler. But under our Government of the people the same questions of political economy, questions of revenue and expenditure and public debt, of currency and finance arise that have occupied the attention of governments since governments were instituted.

From these questions we took no departure; they are upon us to-day. And upon these questions we can never with safety wholly close our eyes to the past, nor wisely refuse to be instructed by the experience of the older nations of the earth; for these questions have been much the same under all governments and in all ages. But let foreign precedents go for what they are worth. We have seen what an immense moneyed interest is represented by agriculture, how varied are its interests, and how a slight improvement over so vast a field would result in an increased value of production almost beyond apprehension. We have seen its relations to the industrial and economoc problems which crowd upon us.

We have seen how by the creation of new industries new fields would be opened for labor and great accessions of wealth accrue to our people. We have seen that agriculture furnishes over 82 per cent. of all the products that we sell to foreign countries, and that if those products should fail altogether or be greatly dimished, financial disaster and national bankruptcy would follow. And who, as he studies this subject in all its bearings, can say that a department in which center such vast possibilities of wealth and which involves so extensively questions of demand and supply of taxation and labor and finance, ought not, as contributing to the prosperity and permanency of the Government itself, to be recognized in the ministry of its affairs? Columella, who lived during the time our Saviour was upon the earth, said of agriculture that "it was the blood relative of wisdom." Surely if this relationship still continues, a seat for her will not be out of place in the Cabinet.

Mr. MOREY. Mr. Speaker, by the provisions of this bill it is proposed to enlarge the powers and increase the scope of usefulness of the Agricultural Department, and to elevate it to the dignity of an Executive Department of the Government. Under existing law and practice we have seven Departments for the administration of our affairs: first, the Department of State; second, the Department of War; third, the Department of the Treasury; fourth, the Department of Justice; fifth, the Post-Office Department; sixth, the Department of the Navy; seventh, the Department of the Interior. It is proposed, sir, to add now an eighth department, whose province and duty it shall be to take cognizance of that great industry and of those immense resources which underlie, and the preservation and proper use of which are necessary prerequisites to, the development and prosperity of every other, to wit, the Department of Agriculture.

If this bill passes and becomes a law upon our statute-books, he who is now called the Commissioner of Agriculture will be advanced from being the head of a mere bureau to the station and dignity of a constitutional adviser to the President of the United States. It is proposed not only to enlarge the powers of the head of this department by extending the scope of his labors to broader limits, but it is intended also to dignify his high office and the great industry which it is his duty to represent by giving him a seat in the President's Cabinet.

The wisdom of this measure must be determined by the magnitude and importance of the interests upon which it operates and the manner in which they are affected by its provisions. The demand for this legislation must be heeded or disregarded by the House in the light of its effect upon the great industries of the country to which it is directed, and in the light of its effect upon the condition and prosperity of the individual citizens of our land and upon national welfare and power. It is broad and comprehensive in its scope; it is far reaching in its provisions; it deals with and operates upon the great problems that underlie our national greatness and power.

These problems must be wisely and intelligently considered, and must be correctly solved, if we would continue in our present pathway of prosperity and wealth and would hand down to our children the glorious heritage of peace and plenty, of morality, virtue, and intelligence that we now enjoy.

It is my judgment, sir, that the magnitude of this industry, the overshadowing importance of agriculture in this country, justifies the recognition which this bill extends and the powers which it confers for its advancement on American soil.

We have made wonderful progress in this country. Our rapid advance in population, in education and general intelligence; our mastery of the useful arts, our proficiency in all the sciences, our prowess in war, our excellence in all things that indicate and accompany a high civilization of a people, have secured us the just encomiums of all nations. We have sprung from small beginnings to the magnificent proportions we now enjoy. The machinery of our Government has been from time to time enlarged and adapted to our increasing needs and growing importance.

The Executive Departments have been created and established as necessity arose, and as their importance developed their respective heads became members of the President's Cabinet, and part of his official family.

The following extract from a speech delivered by Hon. J. T. UPDEGRAFF, in the Forty-sixth Congress, is a brief but interesting statement of the growth of the Cabinet:

In September, 1789, six months after the inauguration of Washington, three Executive Departments were created by statute, and to them special duties were assigned. These were the Departments of State, of the Treasury, and War. The several heads of these alone composed the Cabinet, which sat in council with Washington. In 1798 a Navy Department was organized by law, and its first Secretary, Benjamin Stoddard, took his seat in the Cabinet of John Adams with Pickering, Wolcott, and McHenry. The Constitution authorizes Congress "to establish post-offices and post-roads," but that Department was never by statute elevated into a full Executive Department. That was done by the edict of Jackson, who, in March, 1829, appointed John McLean, of Ohio, Postmaster-General, and called him to a seat in his Cabinet with Van Buren, Ingham, Eaton, and Branch. In 1849 the Department of the Interior was created, and its first Secretary, Thomas Ewing, became a member of the Cabinet. The Attorney-General, of course, was a member of the Cabinet also, though he had no Executive Department until 1870, when Congress by law established the Department of Justice. Thus the Cabinet has been enlarged from time to time as the new demands and needs of our rapidly progressive development indicated the wisdom of such change. We have an Army of only 25,000 soldiers, but a Secretary of War in full Cabinet rank. We have no Navy worthy of the name, but the Secretary of that Department sits at the council of the President. The Secretary who supervises mail contracts, and the Secretary who has charge of the Indians and of the wild lands of the Government, each, by virtue of his office, belongs to the President's council.

Agriculture has sprung from small proportions. At the time of the formation of our Government there were no large cities in the country. Our population then was almost wholly engaged in agricultural pursuit. There were then but few manufactories of any kind from one end of the land to the other. The wants of our people were few and simple; the farmer's wife and daughters spun and wove the wool and flax that was grown on the homestead into cloth, and made it into garments for the use of the family. Such rude implements of husbandry as were needed were made by the local or village mechanic, who received products of the farm for his pay. Our people were then in effect all producers; there was little or no commerce, either foreign or inland. The products of the farm were the medium of the local exchanges that took place. Settlements were mainly on the navigable streams and their tributaries; these were the highways of such transportation as was carried on in the early days.

There are many men yet living in the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor who well remember the primitive customs and methods to which I have alluded. Those living on the banks of the Miami and the Ohio Rivers can recall the day when the little surplus produce of the neighboring farms was collected by the local merchant and trader and transported on flat-boats to New Orleans, to be exchanged for sugar and molasses, and such other domestic supplies as those early markets afforded.

We have outgrown that condition, and have passed far beyond that primitive state of affairs; great cities have sprung up in every State; our growing population, increased by large immigration, has spread out far beyond its early limits; it overflowed from the Eastern States when it had an early footing on the seaboard; it passed over mountains, crossed streams, flowed onto and over the great prairies of the West, turning their waste places into happy homes of teeming millions and their desert places into fields of waving grain and ripening corn; it crossed the arid plains of the far West, crossed over the Rockies and Sierras, and rolled down the Pacific slope. From a mere handful, settled on the seaboard and along the navigable streams, we have grown to be one of the greatest of nations, in population, in resources, influence, and power, extending from Plymouth Rock on the East to the Golden Gate in the West. Our industries have become enlarged and diversified; primitive customs and methods have passed away.

A necessity is now upon us to make the best possible use of the great resources with which our country is endowed by nature. If the ratio of our increase of population continues, the time is not many decades distant when the great resources of our country will be called into fullest requisition for the sustenance and support of the almost fabulous numbers who are to inhabit this land in the times to come. To-day, a little more than one-half, or about twenty-eight millions of our people are engaged in agricultural pursuits. They are the producers who create and make all wealth and property. From the soil spring the sources of every industry and prosperity. In it are laid the foundations of our national wealth and power. Let us see to it that they are built upon solid rock and cemented by justice, wisdom, and equity.

The following table is a remarkable exhibit of the extent of farming operations, and of the products resulting therefrom in this country. It will furnish food for reflection to the most thoughtless:

It will be seen that there were under cultivation in this country, in 1880, 164,710,567 acres of land, and that the value of the principal farm crops for that year amounted to the sum of $2,131,051,859. To this is to be added the value of hogs, cattle, sheep, and horses. In the winter of 1880–'81 there were packed at the various packing places in the country 16,357,360 hogs. We had 11,429,626 horses, of the value of $667,954,325; 1,720,731 mules, of the value of $120,096,164; 12,368,653 milch-cows, of the value of $296,277,060; 20,937,702 oxen and other cattle, of the value of $362,861,509; 43,576,890 sheep, of the value of $104,070,759; 36,247,603 hogs, of the value of $170,535,435. Sir, it is estimated that the capital invested in this industry amounts to about $15,000,000,000, and that its annual product now equals $2,500,000,000. One-half of our great population is engaged in this pursuit. The other half depends on it for bread.

In return the farming population become a market for the products of the great manufactories that have sprung up and been established in the cities and towns throughout the country. Our industries have become greatly diversified; they depend each upon the other, and the prosperity of one is enhanced by the growth and prosperity of the other. It is of the utmost importance that the relations of each to the other shall be correctly understood, that the highest possibilities of each be known and attained to in practice.

It is a curious fact that during the early years of our history the agricultural interest received little or no attention by the Government. The present department is the outgrowth and result of individual effort of one whose wise and comprehensive view of the importance of agriculture in this country and its relations to the other growing industries of the land early directed his efforts to some practicable plan by which its methods could be improved and its possibilities increased. In the year 1836 Hon. Henry L. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, was appointed the first Commissioner of Patents, by President Jackson. Since 1793 the granting of letters patent had been confided to the Secretary of State. The duty of examining applications was at first intrusted to one clerk. I only refer to this fact, because when we consider the present state of invention in the country, it illustrates in a striking manner the growth and development of inventive skill and ingenuity in our country, and because the Agricultural Department is an outgrowth of the Patent Office. The intimate relations between agriculture and other industries and the great influence invention and art were destined to have upon practical farming early engaged the thoughtful attention of Mr. Ellsworth. The many improvements in implements used by the farmer suggested its importance to him, and directed his attention to devising methods by which it should keep pace with and, if possible, excel all others. How well his efforts and the efforts of those who followed him in his work have succeeded the following table will fully exhibit, from which it will appear that from 1871 to 1880 the exports of agricultural products ranged from 70 per cent. to 89½ per cent. of our entire exports:

During the first two years of his incumbency in the Patent Office Mr. Ellsworth, without any legal authorization, distributed large quantities of new and rare seeds and plants that were transmitted to him as voluntary and gratuitous contributions for that purpose. In 1839 Congress appropriated $1,000, to be taken out of the Patent Office fund, to continue the work he had begun. Such, sir, was the beginning of the Agricultural Department, which is to-day the representative of the greatest industry of our country and which is today seeking just recognition and acknowledgment.

It is a fit and striking reminder of the rapid growth and of the progress our nation has made in its brief but brilliant life. These annual appropriations were continued for many years, being wholly omitted, however, in 1840, 1841, and 1846. Since 1853 appropriations for this department have been made directly from the Treasury. The aggregate of appropriations from the establishment of the Government up to 1853 for the promotion of agriculture amounted only to the paltry sum of $39,000.

It is a singular fact to contemplate that in the first seventy years of our national existence, with a land so marvelously adapted to that most honorable pursuit, the gross outlay by the Government to investigate, develop, and conserve so great and growing an interest should be limited to such small proportions. By the present law the duties of this department, which was established by act of Congress in 1862, are defined to be "to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture, in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and to procure, propagate, and distribute among the people new and valuable seeds and plants."

The other provisions of the law relating to the department deal only with matters of detail, and do not in any degree enlarge the field of its labors. The present bill does not propose the mere elevation of the dignity of the office. It proposes to advance and extend the plane of usefulness of this department, to give it a wider range and scope of action. The modes of farming are to be investigated and reported upon. The adaptation of crops to the several sections of the country, the preferable varieties of seeds, fruits, &c., are to be ascertained.

A bureau of animal industry is created, to investigate concerning the condition of domestic animals, and the causes, prevention, and cure of contagious, communicable, and other diseases. When we consider the ravages that have been made among our domestic animals by epidemic and contagious diseases in recent years, the importance of the work intrusted to this bureau cannot be overestimated.

In the bureau of lands the resources and capabilities of our public and other lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, and other industrial uses, are to be ascertained that they may be employed to the best advantage, to increase the wealth and prosperity of the nation. But, sir, one of the most important bureaus created by this bill is the bureau of statistics. I read it here, that its full import and importance may be impressed on the minds of members of this House.

Fourth. The bureau of statistics, the chief of which shall collect and report the agricultural statistics of the United States; and, in addition, all important information or statistics relating to industrial education and agricultural colleges; to labor and wages in this and other countries; to markets and prices; to modes and cost of transporting agricultural products and live stock to their final market; to the demand, supply, and prices in foreign markets; to the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, their sources of raw material, methods, markets, and prices; to such commercial or other conditions as may affect the market value of farm products or the interests of the industrial classes of the United States. And the Secretary is hereby authorized to establish such divisions in this bureau, and to make such monthly or other reports as he shall deem most effective for the prompt dissemination of such reliable information respecting crops and domestic and foreign markets as will be of service to the farmers or other industrialists of the United States.

In order that any man or class of men shall profit by the experience and efforts of other men it is necessary to know what that experience is, and what those efforts are. I believe, sir, that there is no class of people who are more earnestly striving to bring intelligence to their calling than the farmers. No class of people are more generally intelligent and informed. No people engaged in any industry are more keenly alive to its interests, or more earnestly desire to have all the benefits of investigation in its business and pursuits, than the farming community of this country. They have, by every reasonable effort, endeavored to become educated and intelligent, and to procure all the light that experiment, experience, and science can throw upon the methods and means of securing better results in their chosen avocation in each succeeding year than they had in the preceding one.

By helping themselves they benefit the whole people and establish the nation on firmer foundations. In every county in the country—I know it is so in my State and district—farmers' institutes are established and in successful operation. There intelligent discussion is carried on by men who are painstaking students. Through their efforts the information procured by the Bureau of Statistics will be communicated to those most interested therein, and the soil will be compelled to yield more bountifully by the appliance of newly discovered facts and the adoption of better methods.

But, sir, we are not interested alone in knowing how much our great agricultural domain can be made to produce. It is of vital and lasting importance to our people and to our country that this great product shall serve wise and beneficent purposes. It being the foundation of all industries, let us see that its relations to them are understood and preserved. It is of importance to know the prices of labor in this and in other countries. It is the pride of our country to dignify and elevate labor, and the value of wages is determined by its capacity to supply the wants of the man who earns it for himself and family. I believe, sir, by that test none are better paid than American laborers.

The mode and cost of transporting our products to market is a question of most vital importance, and determines the value itself of agricultural products. They are bulky and heavy, and must be carried long distances to the great cities where their consumers live, and to the seaboard for export. Our country is of such broad extent that our farmers are compelled to rely upon the great railroads of the country for transportation. These great corporations are creatures of the law. They obtain their franchises from it; yet they assume to dominate and control it. Sir, it is wisely provided that this bureau shall collect statistics on this question. There is none other in which the farmer is so vitally interested.

No statistics can so interest him as those relating to the cost of getting to market the product of his labor, and none will tend so much to right the wrongs to which he is now subject in that regard. It is the constitutional right as it is the duty of the law to control its creatures and to see to it that they truly subserve the purposes for which they were created, without extortion, without unjust and unreasonable discrimination.

The value of monthly reports respecting crops are a needful aid to the success of this industry. In their light combinations to advance or repress prices will be less successful, and the farmer will thereby more surely obtain the just remuneration due to his toil.

I have not time to further particularize or refer to the special merits of this bill. The bill, sir, has come from the Committee on Agriculture as a substitute for sundry bills introduced by members of the House, and referred to that committee for its consideration. This substitute has been reported back to the House by the committee, who recommend its favorable consideration and passage.

Mr. Speaker, I am keenly alive to the agricultural interest in this country; its magnitude is so great, the number of our people engaged in it is so large, its preservation and enhancement are so necessary to national welfare, and the prosperity and happiness of the people everywhere, whether in the great cities, the towns, or the country, that any measure tending to conserve that great industry would have my cordial and earnest support. This bill comes to us predicated upon the careful consideration and mature deliberation of one of the most important, as it is one of the most ably constituted committees of the House.

It is doubly entitled to, and therefore justly demands the candid and careful consideration of this body. To the great interest that justly belongs to this subject, and which of itself must commend any just measure in its behalf to our most careful consideration, is added the deliberate judgment of a committee of honorable men charged by the appointment of the Speaker and the rules of this House with its examination and consideration.

Sir, it is unnecessary to contend that the interest of agriculture alone is entitled to or demands the fostering care of our Government and such appropriate legislation as may be constitutionally enacted. The preservation of the aggregated industries of the whole country and their encouragement to the highest possible stage of development and excellence is necessary to the success, the profits, and benefits of each. The sacrifice of one, indeed the impairment of any one industry in a country, must sooner or later result in injury to every other industry.

The impairment of one must necessarily impair every other. The prosperity of each contributes to the prosperity of all. Agriculture in the United States is of paramount importance, because it is the greatest industry. Its products exceed the value of the aggregate of products of all other industries in our land. Its preservation and its development to the very utmost of its resources, by every appliance of art, and the employment of every fact that science can discover and appropriate, becomes the manifest duty, as it should be the pleasure and pride, of the representatives of a great people like ours.

Sir, it is estimated that the aggregate of agricultural products in this country in the year 1880 exceeded $2,500,000,000, and equaled about three-fourths of all the products of all our industries of every kind. When we consider this great fact, which speaks with more emphasis than any words I can employ, we begin to realize the overshadowing importance of conserving and promoting an industry whose magnitude and proportions imagination itself can scarcely comprehend. It is the foundation of all other industries and pursuits, and upon the bed-rock of our great system of agriculture the splendid superstructure of our national greatness and power is built. From it the nation draws its life-blood. Its arteries are fed from the great life-giving source of all our successes, our progress, and our achievements. Labor alone creates wealth and makes property, whether it be in taking gold and silver from the bowels of the earth or in causing the golden grain to spring from her bosom. The farmer is the great producing class in our country. In his calling is embraced more than half our entire population.

More than 28,000,000 people are engaged in agriculture in the United States. If we estimate five as the average family more than 5,000,000 houses are upon the farms of our country, their occupants living the rugged, honest, and independent life of tillers of the soil. There is none more independent, more useful, or more honorable. Agriculture has indeed made great progress. This, sir, has been unjustly urged as a reason why the Department of Agriculture should not be advanced in dignity, or the scope of its usefulness enlarged. But, sir, this argument is not well founded in any good reason that it suggests or advances. It may be true that the agricultural industry of this country has advanced to its present magnificent proportions mainly by its own unaided efforts, through the industry, perseverance, and intelligence of those engaged in it. It may be true that, however neglected it may be, it will go on increasing in extent and magnitude.

When we consider the extent of our domain and the incomparable average fertility and adaptation of our soil to diversified crops, the future of agriculture on this continent cannot be dwarfed from magnificent proportions. But, sir, a wise and provident government, looking to the future and considering the happiness and welfare of generations yet to come, will see to it not only that agriculture shall be great but that all its possibilities shall be realized, and that its great promise shall ripen into a grand and glorious fruition.

Amendment proposed by Mr. HASELTINE, of Missouri:

Amend section 3 as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the statistician to collect all information relating to the railroad system of the country, and the absolute cost of constructing and operating the same.

"It shall also be the duty of the statistician to report monthly the railroad freights and tariffs upon the principal lines of transportation. Also any discrimination which may be made upon any of said lines for or against certain localities."

Mr. HASELTINE. Mr. Speaker, according to the statistical report of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, South Carolina, for 1882, the States of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Ohio, Tennessee, and Wisconsin produce three-fourths of the grain crop of the whole country. In 1875 the total crop of the United States was 2,032,235,300 bushels, of which 1,467,237,000 were grown in the States named. In 1880 these States produced 2,003,204,000 bushels out of a total crop of 2,686,145,129, or an increase over 1875 of 535,967,000 bushels, or about one hundred million bushels a year.

The principal grain-shipping cities in the Northwest are Saint Louis, Peoria, Chicago, Milwaukee, Duluth, Detroit, and Toledo.

The receipts of grain and flour at the Atlantic and Gulf ports in 1875 amounted to 188,357,221 bushels, of which 178,114,750 bushels came from the same Western cities just named. In 1880 the receipts had grown to 364,017,557 bushels, of which 321,539,058 came from these cities, being an increase in six years of 143,424,308 bushels, or an average of about twenty-four million bushels a year. The grain and flour of the West are now brought to the Eastern ports by five trunk lines of railroads, and by the New York canals. Of late there have been large shipments to the Gulf by the Mississippi River. The profit of the Western farmer and dealer is determined mainly by the rate charged for the transportation of the produce to the Atlantic or Gulf ports. During the summer months the competition between the railroads and the canals prevents exorbitant charges, but during the winter months, when the canals are closed, the railroad rates are injuriously high. This is shown by a comparison of the rates charged at different seasons in the six years from 1875 to 1881.

The charge for carrying a bushel of wheat in the years named averaged 11 cents by water and 17 cents by rail during the period when the canals were open, and 22 cents a bushel by rail during the winter, when the canals were closed. Now, we say that a just system of legislation should certainly keep the rates of transportation down to the summer average. This would be a saving of 5 cents a bushel. This saving in the shipments from the same cities named would amount to at least $14,469,257 a year, with no larger shipments than those of 1880. Five cents per bushel upon wheat at 20 bushels per acre would be $1 per acre upon all the wheat lands. Five cents per bushel upon corn at 40 bushels per acre would be $2 per acre upon all of the corn lands. This would be equal to one-half of the average rent upon all wheat lands, and full rent upon all corn lands, of the West and South. There is no doubt that a rate very much less than the summer average would render a liberal compensation for the use of the real capital invested by the owners of the roads.

We have donated to wealthy corporations a quantity of land sufficient to make eight States as large as Ohio; we have paid large sums of money; we have bonded debts spread over the counties of most of the States of the West. Yet the Government, in its great liberality to capitalists, after having contributed so large a proportion in building the railroads, donates all to companies with special privileges to control the freights according to what they will bear, which makes all the farmers of the West and South renters, and a large number of paupers, with an aristocracy of railroad kings in the Eastern cities. This is a more ingenious system of rentage and serfdom than that of Ireland. We demand that all of these great public highways shall be controlled by the Government in accordance with the great principles of equity. "We demand equal and exact justice for all, and special privileges for none." Agriculturists ask for no special legislation to protect that class of wealth producers in this country.

The capitalists who have received these immense lines of transportation largely, as donations from the people and the Government, meet in council and determine what portion of all the crops they will take as rents from all of the farms of the West and South. These capitalists control to a great extent the elections, and send their attorneys to make laws for their renters. They place their attorneys upon the bench to enforce such laws. Another class of capitalists to whom the Government donates from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 annually, and who are interested in the defenseless condition of American renters and dependent laboring classes, also help to control the elections, and to control the Government in the interest of a moneyed aristocracy. The object of the Government should be to encourage and protect all of the industrial classes in the development of the resources of the country.

The Government should protect both producers and consumers in an equitable system of cheap transportation and cheap currency. We ask that the Department of Agriculture shall be an Executive Department; not that sinecure places may be made for favorites of party; not merely that large books may be published minutely describing worms, bugs, beetles, and locusts, as though they were the principal enemies of the agriculturist; but that independent, nonpartisan business men shall be made officers of this department, who will fearlessly perform their public duties, and may show to the country that special legislation granting special privileges to capitalists makes paupers in the West and millionaires in the East. As about thirty millions of the American population are employed in agriculture, simple justice requires a proper consideration of the rights, interests, and just protection of this large proportion of the great producers of American wealth. Let the Department of Agriculture be made practically useful to the people. Let its officers be authorized to collect all such statistics as may be necessary in developing all of the great resources of the country, and showing what legislation may be necessary to protect the agriculturists in a just system of transportation and a reasonable enjoyment of the fruits of their toil.

The late war and the amendments of the Constitution decided that there should be no more ownership of the bodies of the laboring classes. Capitalists would now attempt to absorb by special law, granting special privileges, the products of industry. This is now a cheaper and more comprehensive system of slavery, and the money lords have made millions of dollars where the negro owners made thousands. We demand that civil government shall guarantee the divine rights of every laborer to the results of his toil.

Mr. WISE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything special upon this bill, although I regard it as one of exceeding great importance. In the Forty-sixth Congress I made the first speech in favor of a bill similar to this one, and I believe it to be entirely proper to make the Department of Agriculture an Executive Department.

While I would be exceedingly careful about increasing officers, would rather make a mistake and fail to create some office of a doubtful character than to create one entirely unnecessary, I believe that this office is one which is demanded by the great interests of the country. We are to some extent, I have no doubt, creating officers and increasing their pay to an extent that is not necessary. But I think this office is one which is demanded by the great agricultural interests, and has been grossly neglected up to this time. I shall therefore advocate this bill with all the energy and with all the determination that I believe its importance demands.

I might supplement what I said in the Forty-sixth Congress by referring to the variety of our climate, surpassing that of any country in Western Europe, and even that of the Russian Empire. The Russian Empire, though covering a large territory, has not a climate so varied as ours. We have here all varieties of climate from that of the tropics to that of high northern latitudes.

I believe that the best talent and greatest experience of our most cultivated men should be brought to the head of this department; I believe that the department should be honored with the highest and most accomplished officers the country can supply. I regret to say that has not been done, but either by design or through neglect the very opposite has been the case.

In all the leading governments recorded in the past history of our race agriculture has been deemed of primary importance, and other interests have been looked to as merely secondary. I am happy to say that this country is rapidly reaching the point where it considers this interest as one of prime importance. And I believe that the influences which will be thrown around this department will be of such a character that the best minds can be drawn upon, not only in our own country, but in foreign countries, to strengthen and dignify the cause of agriculture. Let me endeavor to give some idea of its importance. We can faintly estimate the value of millions, but when we come to billions, come to consider that the amount of capital invested in real estate in this country is not less than sixty billions of dollars, it seems to be beyond the grasp of human intellect.

I was very recently written to by one of my constituents who has seen fit to cast his lot in the State of Florida. He wrote to me to obtain for him some tropical seeds and plants, anything of the kind that could be obtained at the Agricultural Department here. In that State the planting season embraces nearly the entire year. That shows the extent and variety of the planting and harvesting season of our country.

It is true that the other interests have their professors and their experts, while the farming interest has nothing of the kind. In Europe the daily laborer on the farm receives the very lowest wages, which is to some extent a reflection upon that interest. Now, I believe that the planter and the agriculturist while perusing the great book of nature and making himself familiar with her works is entitled to honorable mention, and his name should be recorded among those of professors and experts. We believe that they should receive the very best compensation, so that the return may be in proportion to the wages paid.

I know that a great many States in this Union have agricultural departments and agricultural schools and colleges extensively endowed. There is a farming school in my State which devotes much time to experiment. That is all right, and only affords an additional reason why the national department of agriculture should be raised to the highest point of distinction in the administration of our Government. A great many visitors may go to our agricultural department in the State of Pennsylvania, in the State of Ohio, and in other States; but this city is the central point, and the Agricultural Department of the United States is the central point from which information is distributed throughout the length and breadth of the country. If it is proper and commendable for States to build up these State agricultural institutions, so much the more reason is there why we should build up a great agricultural institution in this city. Every person visiting this capital, of any enterprise or activity, necessarily seeks to visit the Agricultural Department for the information and entertainment which he may receive there.

One single thought more, which I very frequently think members on this floor forget. The great area east of the Mississippi River is to a large extent under culture. But let your eye pass over the map and look at the vast territory west of the river, almost unbroken, almost untouched; yet nature has reared very few obstructions to the agricultural development of that region. When we remember the primitive state of agriculture in that great western part of our country I think it should be an incentive to every member of the House to favor every such measure as this bill, in order to help forward the march of agriculture west of the Mississippi.

A few years ago that whole country was given up to the savage. Now it is spanned by a railroad; and any one traveling on that road can at once see the power and influence which it exerts in favor of agriculture in affording facilities for the transportation of any commodities that may be produced. Thus it will be seen that the transportation facilities, as well as immigration and the increase of population in our country, are outstripping the provisions which are being made by legislation for helping forward the progress of agriculture. Upon a bill like this, which calls for an expression of opinion from members East and West, I do hope that those opposing the bill, if any can consistently oppose it, will be but few. I think, sir, that what we are about to do in this Congress should have been properly done five or ten years ago. In that case we would be reaping to-day the fruits of this measure.

Mr. CULLEN addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. ANDERSON. In behalf of the committee I give notice of the following amendment, which will be offered to-morrow, and which I submit now for the purpose of having it printed in the RECORD:

In line 25, section 3, strike out all after the word "uses," to and including "department of agriculture," in lines 29 and 30, and insert, "and the commission now known as the Geological Survey shall hereafter hold the same relation to the department of agriculture which it has heretofore held to the Department of the Interior."

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a few considerations in support of the general proposition now before the House; and not expecting to be in the Hall any considerable part of the time to-morrow, I avail myself of the present opportunity to express the hope that this bill in some form may pass this House and become a law. Last year, when this proposition was under consideration here, I insisted that there should be established a department of industry, embracing agriculture, commerce, and manufactures—substantially what is proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. KENNA.] I am not yet satisfied that that is not a better proposition than the one presented by the Committee on Agriculture, and which is more directly under discussion to-night. Still I do not propose to be as earnest as I was last year in advocating this proposition; yet I feel that I can safely vote for the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia if it shall come before the House for action.

I cannot understand why the agriculturists of this country should not be satisfied with the department which would be established by this amendment, because the bureau of agriculture would after all be the leading bureau. The gentleman from West Virginia presented, it seems to me, very good arguments in support of the amendment, because really the interests of agriculture are not wholly divorced from those of commerce; and I can see how the department might be made more useful even to the cause of agriculture itself if the head of the department were called upon to investigate questions growing out of transportation.

It is hardly possible, Mr. Speaker, to overestimate the importance of the subject of agriculture. It is by no means one of the minor or subordinate interests of the country, but is in point of fact its great industry. Out of the earth comes all our wealth; and out of it comes largely our great national prosperity. We all remember how a few years ago agriculture lifted us out of our then financial difficulty. The balance of trade that helped to solve the question of the resumption of specie payments was due to the products of the earth. Agriculture, therefore, ought not to be underrated; and I am convinced that this Congress will satisfy the American people if it shall in a very important manner demonstrate its interest in this great industry.

But it is my purpose now only to call attention to some defects which seem to me to exist in the bill under consideration. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] knows very well that I have taken more or less interest in the subject of forestry; and some years ago a commissioner of forestry was appointed by virtue of an amendment which was inserted in a bill in the Forty-third Congress. That commissioner has made two annual reports and has a third ready for presentation and publication. He has also visited the schools of forestry in Europe, and has almost completed a special report upon those institutions.

Now, it has occurred to me that there ought to be a bureau of forestry, and I have an amendment which, if I should be in the House to-morrow, I shall offer or which I shall ask some one to submit in my behalf if not present myself. It is to insert after the fifty-second line, on the fourth page of the bill, a clause something like this:

Fifth. A bureau of forestry, the chief of which shall be well acquainted with the methods of statistical inquiry, with a view of ascertaining the annual amount of consumption, importation, and exportation of timber and other forest products; the probable supply for future wants; the means best adapted to the preservation and renewal of forests; the influence of forests upon climate, and the measures that have been successfully applied in various countries, or that may be deemed applicable in this country for the preservation and restoration or planting of forests, and to report upon the same to the secretary of agriculture, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

Mr. VALENTINE. Permit me to say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I think if he will change the language, using the word "division" instead of "bureau," the committee will probably be prepared to accept it. Make it a division of forestry——

Mr. DUNNELL. I am not particular. I am free to admit that the division of forestry ought to have a connection with the bureau of lands. But I would not have the chief of that bureau or division a subordinate officer or clothed with less than full and specific powers and duties. I hope I may be present to perfect, Mr. Speaker, an amendment to be submitted to the House to-morrow which shall cover that question, for already, as a part of the Agricultural Department, we have a commissioner of forestry, and I think that subject will in the future attract very much more attention than it has attracted in the past.

The present census, as I stated here once before during this session, declares some very interesting facts with regard to the timber supply in this country. Unless these statistics are all at fault our supply is but one of eighteen years. The consumption of timber in the country is becoming alarmingly great; and I had the honor of addressing the House a short time ago upon that subject. I was assisted in the preparation of the statistical tables which I submitted by the commissioner of forestry, and it has become apparent to him as it has to myself that this is to be one of the great material questions which we are to consider by-and-by, and which we ought to consider now. The gentleman from Kansas as well as the gentleman from Nebraska understands that the three States of Nebraska, Kansas, and Minnesota are greatly interested in this question of forestry. Minnesota suffers in her regulations somewhat because of the severity of the winters, and the preservation of timber as well as the influence of forests upon the climate, is a question to be investigated and one to be very carefully and thoroughly considered.

I know personally, as a resident of that State, that many of the rigors of our winter have been lessened, at least to a certain extent, by the planting of forests.

Mr. HORR. I would like, if it would not interrupt the gentleman from Minnesota, to know if the statistics to which he has alluded in reference to our present forests are of such a character as to warrant the assertion that the country will be pretty much stripped of its timber within eighteen years?

Mr. DUNNELL. Eighteen years is about the average of the timber supply.

Mr. HORR. There must be some mistake about it, because that would include all the enormous pineries of the South as well as the forests of the West. Do they take into account the great pine lands of the South, of Mississippi and other States, and the Alaska timber, as well as the red woods of Oregon?

Mr. DUNNELL. Perhaps the Alaska timber is not included.

Mr. HORR. Certainly it cannot be.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will take pleasure in passing to the gentleman from Michigan a statement which I presented to the House recently upon this subject.

Mr. HORR. I know that ten years ago it was claimed that the forests in the lower peninsula of Michigan would be exhausted at the then rate of destruction within ten years. I believe that at the present rate of cutting our supply there will last for twenty years.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think the statistics show that the supply in Michigan is larger than in many other divisions. Take the division of Maine for instance, and the supply is very light.

Mr. HORR. I suppose so.

Mr. DUNNELL. In the Chippewa division the supply is less than the supply in Michigan, as shown by these tables. The officer in charge of this department has divided the country into sections; and I am of the opinion that the section which the gentleman represents here has a much larger supply on the average than most of these other divisions.

Mr. ANDERSON. If not interrupting the gentleman I would like, at this point, to refer to a remark made a few minutes since in regard to this subject of forestry; and I wish to make, if he will permit me, two suggestions with regard to the committee's bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON. The first is that this bureau of lands (which, by the way, is a wholly distinct thing from what is known in the Interior Department as the map department) is intended in this section to cover the whole undeveloped public domain; and is also intended to provide for the survey or investigation of that domain with respect to its practical resources.

The chief of that bureau is directed to investigate and report upon the resources or capabilities—either the one or the other—of the public or other lands for timber purposes, as well as for farming, mining, and other industrial uses. Now my point is, that the committee have by no means overlooked the importance of this matter of forestry; and in the opinion of the committee this third bureau of lands, provided for in the bill, would, when organized and thoroughly equipped, entirely cover the broad question of forestry under the general provisions of this section. Then there is another suggestion, to which the gentleman's attention has not been perhaps heretofore attracted, bearing upon this same question, which is found embodied in the last section of the bill, and by the way this is worthy of consideration in connection with some other objections which have been urged against special provisions of this bill:

That all laws and parts of laws relating to the department of agriculture now in existence, as far as the same are applicable and not in conflict with this act are—

In other words, you have the department with all its machinery still in existence, and a part of that machinery still in force and existence under this bill is the commissioner of forestry. So that under this bill you carry out the same idea which is in no sense hampered or impaired with reference to this important subject.

I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will offer the amendment, however, to which he refers, and let it be printed in the RECORD for information to-morrow.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not come here this evening for the purpose of making a speech, but only to state the interest I have felt on this subject and more particularly to allude to what seemed to me to be a defect in the bill. And in reply to the gentleman from Kansas, I think he would hardly like to leave so important an officer as the commissioner of forestry to have his place in the new department regulated by this section. He will admit at once and see the fitness of having the commissioner of forestry provided for specifically in the bill creating the new department of agriculture. Therefore, I think the amendment to which I have alluded briefly and crudely should have a place in the body of the bill.

The gentleman from Nebraska thinks it would be sufficient if forestry was made a division in the bureau of lands. I have felt very many times within the past two or three years that the commissioner of forestry as originally created should have been an officer rather of the land department than of the agricultural department; and I think the commissioner of forestry would have worked more harmoniously connected with the land department than with the department of agriculture. But I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that I trust the forestry department may find a place in the bill which he has in his charge.

Let me ask one other question of the gentleman; and I am compelled to plead a considerable amount of ignorance concerning this bill. In what subdivision or in what bureau is there provision for an industry that is claiming a good deal of attention in your own State, Mr. Speaker, [Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, being in the chair,] as well as in mine? I refer to the production of sugar from sorghum or amber cane.

Mr. VALENTINE. That would be included in the first bureau mentioned in the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is embraced in the first clause of section 3, which I will read:

> The bureau of agricultural products, which shall include divisions of botany, entomology, and chemistry, &c.

It will fall there.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think that subdivision of section 3 ought to be made a little more specific if it shall cover that industry.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, there has been very great progress made within a very few years in the production of sirups and of sugar from the amber cane. In my own district I doubt not there are fifty mills, and five hundred or a thousand farmers in that district are now raising one, two, three, five, and ten acres of amber cane, and they are taking it to the mills as in New England they take a barrel of apples to the cider-mills and bring home their cider.

The farmer now takes his ton or half ton of amber cane with a barrel or two on top of the cane to mill and brings back his barrel or two barrels of sirup; and there are also a good many mills in Minnesota where crystallized sugar to the amount of thousands of pounds is manufactured. And I desire right here to say, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the Commissioner of Agriculture, that I think he has not quite comprehended the value and importance of this new industry. A good deal of criticism was passed upon the late Commissioner of Agriculture, General Le Duc, but whatever of errors he may have committed, this was true of him, that he was willing to investigate a step forward and make progress, if it were within his reach.

Mr. HORR. Does the gentleman know, as to the sirup made in his section, whether it is very palatable and good?

Mr. DUNNELL. It is very good; it monopolizes the market. It is the best on the market, and is purchased as the most desirable by all the leading hotels of the State to which I have alluded.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the present Commissioner of Agriculture will not at all be discouraged in the prosecution of all possible investigations in this direction. It has been said that he is not quite so full of faith as was his predecessor that this product of the cane would crystallize. That has recently, I am happy to say, been reported upon unanimously by a large committee appointed by the Academy of Science, with Professor Silliman of Yale University as its chairman. Professor Silliman has written a report, which I trust in a few days will come to the attention of the House and the country, indorsing the complete triumph of the affirmative side of the question as to whether the sirup of the amber cane or the sorghum will crystallize, and I trust, Mr. Speaker, that we shall have this industry a little more carefully and distinctly brought into this third section. At present I do not quite see it in section 3.

I only came here to say this much, and if an opportunity shall be given to me to-morrow, I want to assist in getting a couple of amendments adopted which I trust the gentleman from Kansas will not look upon as injuring his bill.

Mr. LACEY addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. ANDERSON. As no other gentleman seems desirous of speaking, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at nine o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments.

A bill (H. R. No. 459) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the city of Topeka, Kansas, for monumental purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 605) donating cannon and cannon-balls to aid in the construction of a suitable soldiers' monument at Portland, Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 679) donating condemned cannon, &c., for monumental and other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1287) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for the soldiers' cemetery at Gallipolis, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 2195) donating condemned bronze cannon to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut;

A bill (H. R. No. 2552) to donate condemned cannon to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Association of Bellaire, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3001) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to Sampson Post No. 22 of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Rochester, New Hampshire, four condemned cannon;

A bill (H. R. No. 3333) to donate one condemned bronze cannon to the citizens of Otsego, Michigan;

A bill (H. R. No. 3738) to donate iron cannon to the township of Milan, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3877) donating condemned cannon and other munitions of war to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Monumental Association of Lycoming County, Pennsylvania;

A bill (H. R. No. 4545) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to E. E. Sturtevant Post, No. 2, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Concord, New Hampshire, six condemned cannon;

A bill (H. R. No. 4585) to donate two condemned iron cannon to the city of Mansfield, Ohio, to be placed on the public square near the soldiers' bronze monument;

A bill (H. R. No. 4745) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for the soldiers' cemetery at Hamilton, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 5211) granting four condemned cannon to the town of Brandon, Vermont, to be placed near a soldiers' monument in said town;

A bill (H. R. No. 5240) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for monumental and other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the city of Waterloo, Iowa, three condemned cannon and four cannon-balls for decoration of soldiers' cemetery.

Mr. COCKRELL. The committee have instructed me to report, not having had time to reduce it to writing, that in all cases where bronze or brass cannon were proposed to be given by the House those words have been stricken out and the words "cast-iron" inserted before "cannon;" because there are no brass or bronze cannon for disposition. The committee also report against the use of any of this ordnance in the construction of monuments, providing that it shall be used only for ornamentation about the monuments or cemeteries. I am therefore directed to report adversely the bill (H. R. No. 3082) granting condemned cannon to the Anna M. Ross Post No. 94 of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia. The text of the bill does not show that it is for any monumental purpose or cemetery purpose or for ornamentation, and therefore the committee report the bill adversely, recommending that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that that bill be placed on the Calendar. My colleague is interested in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the bills which have been favorably reported by the Senator from Missouri for the appropriation of cannon for soldiers' monuments be now considered. They are of a character which I think will evoke no opposition whatever, and might as well be passed now as later.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator tell us how many condemned cannon the United States have?

Mr. PLUMB. I could do so, but the Senator from Missouri can tell so much better that I yield to him for the purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. The United States has 774 cast-iron, useless, obsolete, condemned cannon of various caliber. I have a list of all of them here, which I formerly laid before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have we any cannon that are not condemned?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir. These are obsolete cannon, utterly useless. The metal in them is worth a cent and a quarter a pound, and the Government cannot use it by recasting for any purpose and make it worth that much to it. All it is worth is simply what it can be sold for in the market. The Government cannot utilize these cannon in any way.

Mr. INGALLS. Could they be remanufactured into condemned cannon?

Mr. COCKRELL. I suppose they could be. I had not thought of that.

Mr. ALLISON. There will be no objection to the consideration of the bills at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] asks for the present consideration of the bills reported favorably by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.] Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bills will be considered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 8th instant, approved and signed the act (S. No. 24) for the erection of a public building at Denver, Colorado; and this day the act (S. No. 238) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Peoria, in the State of Illinois.

PRINTING OF GENEVA CONVENTION AGREEMENT.

Mr. LAPHAM submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

DISTRICT JAIL.

Mr. HAWLEY. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the management and discipline of the jail in the District, with special reference to the privileges granted to prisoners and the freedom with which visitors are admitted.

Mr. President, a single word. The general facts concerning the escape of a very important prisoner from that jail are known to the public; and in the daily papers it is frequently reported that another notorious criminal now under sentence holds a daily levee, and especially upon Sundays. It is said that he receives from sixty to one hundred and twenty-five visitors daily. If this be true, these practices serve no useful purpose whatever. They minister only to a morbid curiosity, and they are prejudicial to public morals. Therefore I have offered this resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions? If not, the morning hour is closed.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call up the House bill to provide for the appointment of a tariff commission. I think it will take no more time than it will require to read the bill, as all the members of the Committee on Finance are in favor of taking it up without a reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to lay aside the Anthony rule for the purpose of considering the tariff-commission bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Temporarily only.

Mr. HARRIS. Would it not be better for the Senator to ask consent of the Senate to consider that bill after we have gone through with the call of the Calendar under the Anthony rule?

Mr. MORRILL. I prefer to have it done now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2315) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff.

Mr. McPHERSON. Perhaps it would be well for the Senator from Vermont to state what alterations or amendments have been made by the House to our bill, in order that the Senate may thoroughly understand the matter.

Mr. MORRILL. This is identically the same bill as the Senate passed with these words only omitted: "and existing system of internal-revenue laws." Those words are left out, as I understand, for the purpose of leaving the Committee on Ways and Means of the House at liberty to propose a bill that will modify the internal-revenue laws.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand that the commissioners are to be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. I advised that there was no necessity for any further delay in regard to this bill by referring it to the Committee on Finance. I was not aware, however, of one fact that I learn this morning, that in March, 1879, shortly before the Eaton bill was presented, Mr. D. J. Morrell, of Pennsylvania, was made president of the American Iron and Steel Association; he was a member of the House of Representatives at the time when the Bessemer steel duty was raised to $28 a ton, and on taking the chair he advised the association thus:

> Demand that the subject shall be intrusted to a commission not of owl-eyed college professors, but of business men and statesmen appointed by the President of the United States, with instructions and authority to ascertain the condition and wants of all our industries, and to examine the tariff legislation of this and other countries with reference to its influence upon national welfare, and demand also that Congress shall refrain from legislation upon the subject until the presentation of the report of this commission. If no other good results from this, we shall at least have what the country most needs, a little rest.

They will get "a little rest" now for a couple of years, and maintain the present condition of things; and they have succeeded so well in getting a continuance that I do not suppose it is worth while to delay it.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the fact that the fourth section provides that the commission are to make their final report on or before the first Monday of December next.

Mr. BECK. That leaves ninety days before the expiration of this Congress, with the appropriation bills and all the other work of Congress to be done; and there will be no time to act on the tariff. There may be a pretense, but there will be no honest attempt to change the tariff. The success of delay is obvious.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I was not in the city when the debate was had upon the Senate bill on this subject and when it was finally adopted by the Senate. I did not therefore have the opportunity of saying what I will briefly say now, that I regard this bill as an empty makeshift that must be absolutely ineffectual.

The way to deal with the tariff would be for Congress to take hold of certain subjects that confessedly need attention and pass some act that would give relief to the industries of the country. We all know that the duties on sugar and on iron and on steel and on many other of the great industrial resources of this country need revision, and we know exactly what they do need, and it is just as competent for Congress to act to-day as it will be after they have had a report from a commission of nine experts, who are to be selected, I suppose, with reference to the views of those who desire that certain policies shall be carried out.

Another matter seems to me to require brief notice, and that is the time when this commission is to report. By the terms of the bill they are to examine into the mining, productive, industrial, commercial, and manufacturing resources and interests of this whole country, and report on the first Monday in December next. Those Senators who vote for this bill with the idea that any result is to follow from it must have a remarkable idea of the capacity of the human intellect with the thermometer up to 100 degrees.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the bill is finally passed I congratulate the Senate on its easy yielding to the amendment proposed by the House bill. I had the honor to offer that amendment in this body, and it received very few votes, and was regarded as a very dangerous provision.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the effect of it?

Mr. ALLISON. Excluding the examination of the internal-revenue system.

Mr. MORRILL. I voted with the Senator.

Mr. BECK. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. I care nothing about the details.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BECK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who is necessarily absent to-day. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] whom I do not see in the Chamber. I do not know how he would vote if here; I would vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) I am paired generally with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN;] but my recollection is that he voted for this bill when it passed the Senate. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VAN WYCK. In that connection I should like to state that my colleague [Mr. SAUNDERS] voted for the other bill, and if he were here, I presume he would vote for this.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CONGER. My colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—35.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following messages from the President of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a letter from the Superintendent of Census, submitting an estimate for an appropriation of $80,000 to defray the expenses of the Census Office during the remainder of the present fiscal year.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 9, 1882.

TIMBER DEPREDATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar will be called under the Anthony rule.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Before the Senate proceeds to consider the Calendar under the Anthony rule, I ask unanimous consent to the taking up of Senate bill No. 1646.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 1646) to amend section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to timber depredations. If there be no objection——

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear the bill read.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will state that the bill is very brief. Perhaps it had better be read.

The bill was read; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 5388 of the Revised Statutes by inserting therein, after the word "purposes," the words "or upon any Indian reservation or lands belonging to or occupied by any tribe of Indians."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. There is now no statute under which persons who depredate upon timber on Indian reservations can be punished. The President communicated to Congress on the 5th of April a bill prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the object of which is to remedy the defect in the statutes. The report is very short; perhaps that had better be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, on April 5, 1882.

Mr. SHERMAN. It need not be read.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It need not be read. I ask to amend the bill, at the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas who sits behind me, [Mr. PLUMB,] by adding to the proposed amendment "under the authority of the United States;" so as to read:

Or upon any Indian reservation or lands belonging to or occupied by any tribe of Indians under authority of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NUMBER OF RECORD FOR SENATE.

Mr. ANTHONY. Following a bad example, I ask leave to make a report at this time, as I was not in when reports were called for.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be received by unanimous consent.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back a resolution directing the Public Printer to furnish additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the use of the Senate, without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Public Printer be directed to furnish, commencing with the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, 3,425 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the use of the Senate, instead of 3,100 copies, as ordered by the concurrent resolution of June 4, 1874.

Mr. ANTHONY. Two new Senators have come in since the apportionment was made, and more copies are required for the Senate Library.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPORT ON LABOR IN EUROPE.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to which was referred a resolution for printing 600 copies of the special report on Labor in Europe and America, by Edward Young, late chief of the United States Bureau of Statistics, have instructed me to report back the same and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. A new edition is coming out which will contain further information.

The report was agreed to.

ATLAS OF COLORADO.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to which was referred a concurrent resolution for binding copies of the Atlas of Colorado, instruct me to report it back without amendment, recommend its passage, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the copies of the Atlas of Colorado heretofore ordered for the use of the two Houses of Congress and the Department of the Interior be suitably bound by the Public Printer for distribution in accordance with the resolution ordering the same.

L. MADISON DAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Cases on the Calendar will be taken up.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I understand there are several Senators who desire to address the Senate upon the Madison Day bill. There will not be time to complete the consideration of that bill this morning, and I ask that it may go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana object to that?

Mr. JONAS. I make no objection.

JAMES M. WILBUR.

Mr. HOAR. There was another case which really ought to have been completed yesterday before the Day bill was taken up. It was the case of Wilbur.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 98) for the relief of James M. Wilbur, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Claims, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That the claim of J. M. Wilbur for compensation for putting in the floor, sidewalk, and raised platforms of the New York post-office be referred to the Court of Claims; and that said court be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to take jurisdiction of said claim, and to allow to said Wilbur an amount which shall be equal to the benefit received by the United States in the illuminated tiling put in the floor, sidewalks, and raised platforms in said building being thicker and stronger than was contracted for. Said allowance shall be on the basis of actual benefit received by the Government, and not on the basis of prorating the extra work according to contract price.

Mr. HOAR. I made a statement in regard to this case the other day, which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] challenged. I think he is now entirely satisfied that I was correct. The statement which I made was on the basis of the House report. This man was the manufacturer of a certain kind of thick glass, and he contracted with the contractor for the New York post-office building to furnish to the satisfaction of the architect the glass required in that contract for a pavement over the sidewalk, of course one of the most constantly occupied sidewalks in the country, the sidewalk by the New York post-office. He gave a bond to do that to the satisfaction of the architect, Mr. Steinmetz. Thereupon the architect required him to put in thicker glass, on the ground, and the sole ground, that the original glass was not thick enough for safety; that when a crowd of men got on that sidewalk it might go through into the cellar.

The committee of the House of Representatives in the last Congress reported to pay this man then a sum which they found to be the actual benefit to the United States by reason of this change in the thickness of the glass. The Committee on Claims of the Senate at this session have preferred, however, to authorize a reference to the Court of Claims of the question how much actual benefit the United States received from the change in this thickness of the glass; of course the only benefit being the benefit of the necessity of greater security.

The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. French, made an elaborate report, in which he held that the United States were liable on a quantum meruit by the law, having changed the contract for their own benefit and having accepted it; but the then Secretary of the Treasury, the present Senator from Ohio, dissented from that legal view and said that all he could do was to send the case to Congress with a statement of the equities, indicating very strongly by the tone of his letter his belief that it ought to be paid, but dissenting from the legal proposition of his assistant, and that Congress would either send it to the Court of Claims or fix the sum and pay it itself. Now the present bill provides for sending it to the Court of Claims with an authority to find how much the United States actually was benefited by the change.

Mr. BECK. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if this is not a very indefinite way of ascertaining how much the United States was benefited by it. It might have lighted up rooms perhaps that could not be used without it, and a great many other things might be considered. I wish simply to get information whether or not, if the man was allowed the extra cost of the glass actually used beyond what he was obliged by his contract to use, that would not be the proper measure of relief?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] can answer that question better than I can, but my impression is that to allow him the extra cost would give him a larger sum than he would get on this suggestion of extra benefit to the United States, and the committee did not want to recognize the right to change the contract.

Mr. BECK. I care nothing about it.

Mr. HOAR. That point is considered in the report of the House committee made by Mr. O'Connor in the last Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. It may be necessary, perhaps, for me to make some explanation further than that already made in connection with this bill. The bill as originally introduced claimed about forty-eight thousand dollars from the Government. The committee, after an examination into the merits of the case, reached the conclusion that that amount ought not to be paid. The claim in the original bill includes the difference in value between the glass and the iron work actually done and that which was stipulated in the contract. We did not believe that the party was entitled to that much compensation. It was shown very satisfactorily that some benefit had been derived to the United States from the making of certain portions of the work thicker and stronger. As was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, we did not think he was entitled to the extra cost of doing this work, because we had an idea that possibly there was more material used, more cost incurred, than was necessary. In other words, while the testimony tended to show that the original standards were not strong enough, it also tended to show that more material was put in than was actually necessary, and so we concluded to recommend to the Senate to pay Mr. Wilbur only for the actual benefit which the United States received by reason of the extra work; and I think from the evidence before the committee, the amount does not exceed five or six thousand dollars.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Mississippi permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is there anything in the nature of this inquiry that requires a reference of it to the Court of Claims? I understand the inquiry to be as to a mere fact, involving no principle whatever.

Mr. GEORGE. None in the world.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It is to ascertain what benefit the Government of the United States has derived from the change in this work. Now, what is there in that question to justify its reference to the Court of Claims?

Mr. GEORGE. The Committee on Claims deems itself very competent to settle all questions of law that come before it; but on questions of fact, like this one, we ascertained by partial experiment in this case that if we went into an examination of the various witnesses that would be produced on the one side and the other, it would consume the time of a sub-committee for several weeks. I entered on that examination as one of the sub-committee, and spent two weeks on it, and in that period I discovered there would be more time taken up, and we thought as the Court of Claims had plenty of time to attend to the business, and as counsel would represent the Government as well as the claimant before the Court of Claims, and as we had no counsel for the Government before us, it was better to refer the question of fact to the Court of Claims.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say one word more in reply to some suggestions which have been made in reference to this claim. It is objected to this claim that the United States is not legally liable to pay it. I admit that. I admit that the United States cannot be held to a legal liability in this matter; but I have understood that the United States in dealing with its own citizens adopted a different rule; that the United States did not insist upon strict legal technical defenses, but that wherever in its transactions with citizens it appeared that the Government had been benefited by the labor, by the skill, by the property of a citizen, and that under circumstances which would make it as between honorable men the duty of the recipient of this benefit to compensate the party, the United States ought to act in that way. I am very sure that the United States would commit a great injustice if they did not pay this party to the extent allowed by this bill. He claims a great deal more. He and his counsel are very much dissatisfied with the bill which we have reported. They do not like the basis upon which we have sent the case to the Court of Claims for adjudication. We allow him nothing directly, but we allow him the chance to go before the Court of Claims and to show that the United States was benefited by his work and labor, and to receive the amount of this benefit. I hope the bill will pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to submit to the Court of Claims the petition of J. M. Wilbur for compensation for extra work done on the United States post-office building in New York."

CHARLES M. BLAKE.

Mr. GROVER. I call up Senate bill No. 1015, which was passed over the other day without prejudice.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1015) for the relief of Charles M. Blake, the pending question being on the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all payments made to Charles M. Blake as post chaplain, United States Army, from and after the 14th day of May, 1878, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, and the proper accounting officers of the United States are hereby authorized and directed to audit and allow payments made to him as post chaplain from and after said date.

Mr. GROVER. There is a report in the case, which I should like to have read.

The Acting Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. GROVER April 18:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Captain Charles M. Blake, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report as follows:

Charles M. Blake was a post-chaplain in the Army of the United States on December 24, 1868.

On that day, he, suffering from disease of body, as he had for a long time prior thereto suffered, and being also of unsound mind to such an extent as not to understand the nature and effect of his acts, wrote a letter to the Secretary of War that was received and considered by all the proper military authorities as a tender of resignation of his said post-chaplaincy.

This resignation was duly accepted to take effect March 17, 1869, and at a subsequent day, to wit, in July, 1870, the President nominated and the Senate confirmed Alexander Gilmore to be post-chaplain, vice said Blake resigned, to rank as such from July 2, 1870. Afterward, September 28, 1878, President Hayes, considering that Captain Blake's insanity rendered the said resignation and its acceptance null and void, ordered his restoration to the list of post-chaplains, with his original date of rank and with pay from May 14, 1878, and the necessary order was duly issued by the War Department.

President Hayes evidently considered that Captain Blake had never been in contemplation of law out of the Army, but that he was not entitled to pay, &c., between April 28, 1869, and May 14, 1878, as another had during that period of time discharged the duties that Captain Blake would, but for his misfortune, have performed, and had received the pay therefor.

Captain Blake considering that his resignation and its acceptance were by reason of his insanity null and void, and that he had never in contemplation of law been out of service, and that therefore he was entitled to continuous pay, &c., as though he had never resigned, brought his suit against the United States in the Court of Claims to test the question. This on the 17th September, 1877.

The Court of Claims and the Supreme Court on appeal decided against Captain Blake.

The Supreme Court decided these points:

1. That Captain Blake ceased to be a post-chaplain in the Army of the United States by and through the President's displacing him by and with the concurrence of the Senate.

2. That the act of displacement was the nomination and confirmation of Alexander Gilmore, as above stated.

3. That as to the question of pay, &c., for the period between April 28, 1869, (date of last payment to Blake,) and July 2, 1870, (date Gilmore took rank,) even if it were conceded that Captain Blake did not cease to be an officer in the Army by reason of the acceptance of his resignation, tendered, &c., yet he could not recover in his said suit, as the United States had, under the act of Congress in regard to the jurisdiction of the United States Court of Claims, interposed a valid plea of the statute of limitations, and the courts were bound to sustain it.

4. That President Hayes's action and the order for Captain Blake's restoration thereunder were ineffectual to make him a post-chaplain in the Army; that he could not again become such except upon a new appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

At a later day, to wit, May 28, 1881, President Garfield nominated Captain Blake to be, and the Senate confirmed him as, a post-chaplain in the Army, and he thereby became such with the rank appropriate thereto by a new appointment, as indicated by the Supreme Court, and clothed with all legal rights incident to such position from the date such new appointment took effect.

From the foregoing statement it will readily be seen that Captain Blake's claim stands in three divisions:

1. From March 17, 1869, to July 2, 1870, when he was not in contemplation of law out of the Army, and during which time he discharged no duties, nor any one else in his place, and the pay, &c., for which time he was debarred from recovering by reason of the statute of limitations.

2. From July 2, 1870, to May 14, 1878, (date he again performed duties as post-chaplain under President Hayes's action and order.) During this second period of time Captain Blake was out of the Army, and Captain Alexander Gilmore discharged the duties and received the pay therefor.

3. From May 14, 1878, to May 20, 1881, during which period Captain Blake, though not in contemplation of law a post-chaplain, yet actually performed the duties of one under the said order of the War Department, but received no pay, &c., therefor.

It will not be overlooked that this third period did not commence until after the bringing of the suit in the Court of Claims, and so there is the open question of law, Did not the order of the War Department, and the actual rendition of services under and in pursuance of it, raise an implied contract to pay for such services?

From the statement of facts it will readily be seen that the case preferred by Captain Blake is almost exclusively one of an equitable character, and addressed to Congress as the nation's court of equity, or perhaps, more correctly speaking to that branch of our Government that is clothed with the most ample power and duty of giving as bounty when in its judgment the facts present a case of sufficient merit to warrant its so giving.

The real question before Congress is, Do the facts of the particular case present such a case of equity as that Congress, acting in such manner as becomes this great and just nation, shall grant to Captain Blake the relief he asks?

That Captain Blake for some time prior to the 24th December, 1868, and up to about the year 1874, was in a greater or less degree insane is clearly proven and admitted both by the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court; also that such bad habit arose from no bad habit of his, but was the result of an injury received by him in 1864, while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty.

It would seem clear that had not Captain Blake become insane there would not have been any tender of a resignation; as also that it would not have been forwarded or accepted had the real state of his mind been known by the authorities.

Your committee therefore recommend that said Chaplain Charles M. Blake be paid in full for his services as chaplain as aforesaid during the period of his actual service from the time he was installed in the Army by order of President Hayes until the date of his commission by President Garfield, confirmed by the Senate; to wit, from the 14th day of May, 1878, to the 20th day of May, 1881, and report S. bill 1015, substitute for bill of same number heretofore reported, and recommend its passage.

Mr. INGALLS. Now let the amendment be read again.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. MILLER, of California. This is a case where a chaplain——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock has arrived.

Several SENATORS. Let us pass the bill.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I do not want the bill passed as it is; I want to amend it. I move to amend the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the Chair will allow the bill to be proceeded with.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment be received and printed.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed by the Senator from California to add to the amendment of the committee:

And the said Charles M. Blake shall be paid as post-chaplain in the Army of the United States from the 25th day of April, 1869, to the 14th day of May, 1878; and the proper accounting officers of the United States are authorized and directed to audit and allow such payment when made.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not that pay him for the time when the courts have decided that he was out of the service?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Yes.

Mr. INGALLS. And that his claim was invalid; so that it is practically a reversal of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. MILLER, of California. It proposes to pay him for the time he was out of the service not by any fault of his.

Mr. INGALLS. But has not the whole matter been subjected to judicial inquiry and decided against him, by a competent tribunal, upon review of all the facts?

Mr. MILLER, of California. Yes; because the statute of limitations ran against his claim, but in equity I think he is entitled to pay.

Mr. INGALLS. Was there not another person performing the duty of the office that he vacated during the period for which he requires pay?

Mr. MILLER, of California. For a part of the time, not for the whole time. From April, 1869, to July, 1870, there was nobody occupying the place of post-chaplain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate consider this bill, or shall it go over until to-morrow?

Mr. MILLER, of California. It may as well be considered now.

Mr. COCKRELL. If there is to be an attempt to change the bill and give an amount more than the committee reported, I object to its consideration.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The Senator has a right to object if he wants to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over until to-morrow, and the Chair calls up the unfinished business.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The amendment is, in section 10, after the word "cases," in line 2, to insert "of appeal to the Supreme Court;" so as to read:

That the decision of the court of appeals upon questions of fact shall, in all cases of appeal to the Supreme Court, be final and conclusive, except as otherwise provided in this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon this amendment the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. McPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.] If he were here, I should vote for the amendment.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.] Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GROOME. I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. MILLER.]

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 28; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Section 11 of this bill is open to some objection to my mind. It reads thus:

That any district judge who, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, shall attend the court of appeals held at any place other than where he resides, shall, upon his written certificate, be paid, by the marshal of the district in which the court shall be held, his reasonable expenses for travel and attendance, not to exceed $10 per day, and such payment shall be allowed the marshal in the settlement of his accounts with the United States.

I do not think that that mode of payment is consistent with the dignity that ought to surround a tribunal like this. I do not think that a judge of a court having jurisdiction without limit and authority coequal with that of the Supreme Court of the United States ought to be paid for his services per diem by the marshal of the court. I think that if any additional compensation is to be given to him it ought to be made in a different way, and he ought to get it just as he gets his other salary, through the Treasury of the United States; and he ought not to be paid like a witness or a juror, upon his own certificate, directed to his own marshal. If this is to be a court of dignity, as I presume it is, and of power, this provision is not compatible with my idea of what it ought to be. If the Senator who has the bill in charge is at all disposed to accept any amendment, I would provide that, instead of a per diem to be allowed to the judges, they receive a yearly compensation to make up for any expenses that they may be called upon to incur in consequence of this extra service. Of course the salaries of the district judges throughout the Union are not uniform; in some districts they receive a great deal more than they do in others; but I do not think that in any case is the compensation greater than what it ought to be; in fact, the judicial salaries of the inferior judges are very inadequate to the duties required at their hands, and I have no objection to this increase, provided it is put in a proper shape.

I would suggest an amendment of this section, that the judges of the district court, who are called upon to perform this service, shall be allowed $600 a year in lieu of this $10 a day, or any other sum that the honorable Senator from Illinois may suggest, if the sum named by me is too much. I am not wedded to any particular amount, but I would rather see them paid annually three or four or five hundred dollars, during any year that they might be called upon to render service in this new court, than to have them paid, like a juror or a witness, on their own certificate directed to the marshal of the court.

Mr. GARLAND. The word "district" has already been struck out, so as to allow compensation to all the judges holding the appellate court.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. "District" is not struck out in my copy of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The word "district" has been stricken out, as the Secretary informs the Chair, by the action of the Senate in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the objection of the Senator from Florida to this provision of the bill seems to be sentimental rather than practical. He argues that the method of payment is inconsistent with the true dignity of a court of justice. It is a point of etiquette; not that the compensation is inadequate and incommensurate to the duties to be performed, but that it degrades the judge down to the level of a common juror who is to be paid by a common marshal of his own court, as if there was some divinity that doth hedge about a judge that separates him from the great mass of mankind.

It is sufficient in response to the allegations of the Senator from Florida to say that this is substantially the method that has long been in force without any particular derogation to the judicial ermine, and that now when the Supreme Court directs a district judge to attend in a different district for the performance of temporary duty in the trial of a cause, he is paid, and has long been paid, upon his certificate of services rendered, by the marshal, like a common juror or any other citizen of low degree.

Therefore, Mr. President, as the duties which are to be performed by these judges are not constant and permanent, but as they are to be successively assigned to duty upon the appellate tribunal, it would appear that unless some more material and serious objection be urged than that presented by the Senator from Florida, this method, so long approved and found to be consistent with judicial dignity, should be retained. It is obviously impossible to make any permanent addition to the salary of these judges that would be satisfactory in the nature of compensation. I should hope that, inasmuch as this method has been tried and proved and found to be satisfactory, it might be retained.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Does the Senator say that the salaries of judges are now paid in that way?

Mr. INGALLS. I said that whenever a district judge is called upon to perform duty in another district he is paid his expenses upon his own certificate by the marshal of the court; and there has been found to be nothing at all inconsistent with the pure and dignified and lofty administration of justice in that.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. There is something more than that involved in this mode of compensation. I do not say that there are any judges on the bench now who would protract their sessions for the sake of $10 a day; but I think the history of the world has furnished such characters. I say the history of judicial annals has presented characters that would have protracted the sittings of their courts beyond the time necessary to do the business of the tribunal, in order to get the $10 per day. I never heard before in my life of a judge being paid by the day for his judicial performances; and that is what this bill does. He certainly will not get less than $10 per day, and I will venture to assert that in every instance the certificate which will emanate from those judicial functionaries will come up to the $10 every time.

I have merely said this much in regard to this provision of the bill. I do not think it is right, and I think it would be better to incorporate a provision looking to a yearly allowance in addition to the salary now provided by law. I merely threw the suggestion out to the Senator from Illinois, who has the bill in charge, and who has such a particular and special interest in it.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to be the object of this bill to get some court as far away from the people as possible. I move to strike out the entire second section of this bill. That section reads as follows——

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator propose to insert anything?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No, I do not; I propose to leave the law as it is.

The second section is in these words:

SEC. 2. That the several circuit courts of the United States shall have and exercise no jurisdiction in cases of appeals or writs of error from the district courts allowed, taken, or sued out after the 1st day of September, 1882, except that reviews in bankruptcy cases, in the exercise of their supervisory jurisdiction, may be had as heretofore provided.

As I was saying, the effect of this bill—I will not say the purpose—is to get the courts as far away from the people as possible. As the law now stands an appeal, as we know, will lie in admiralty from the district court of the United States to the circuit court in all cases in which a sum exceeding $50 is involved. It has been a very meritorious jurisdiction to my knowledge. It embraces in many instances the cases of seamen's wages, that highly meritorious class which is the foundation of our commercial marine. The district court has jurisdiction in the first instance of all admiralty causes, and under existing law an appeal lies in all cases in admiralty for seamen's wages, claims of material-men, for repairs of ships, and advances of money, from the district to the circuit court where the amount in controversy exceeds $50. This jurisdiction has been long open to a very meritorious class of people; but this bill proposes to take it away and give jurisdiction from the court of first instance to the court of appeals only in cases, I understand, involving the sum of $500. This is a very material change in the law.

The Senator who has the bill in charge has gone away from the Chamber; I was in hopes he would remain, because I thought I could make a suggestion even to him that might be of benefit to this bill. I think the jurisdiction ought to go a little lower down than $500, inasmuch as it takes away an existing appellate right, as suitors can now go to the circuit court with a controversy involving $50. A great many poor men will consider this a grievance. It may be, as the Senator from Kansas said awhile ago, a mere sentiment. He knows very well that the world sometimes is moved by sentiment; it may be false; it may be fictitious; it may be an erroneous sentiment, but it has a great deal to do with the actions and the performances of men.

I do not intend to say anything more on that subject, but I propose to strike out this section, and I should like to have the benefit of the wisdom of the framer of this bill to see that something better than this cannot be put in its place. I have not had much time to reflect about it, but I do not think that this jurisdiction now existing in cases of seamen and material-men, who have small claims and who may conceive in many instances their rights are just as much affected as those of a man worth millions, ought to be taken away. They ought not to have the right of appeal taken away if they wish to go to the circuit court. This bill takes it away and says that no man can have a right of appeal unless the sum in controversy exceeds $500. Why should that be? Is there any pressing on the other end? There is pressure up here at Washington, but I have never heard of any pressure in the circuit court. They have ample time, I think, to consider any appeal cases that may be taken there. The Senator from Kansas shakes his head.

Mr. INGALLS. There is nothing in it. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I did not say that, but I conceive that he has investigated the subject, and may be able to state the view of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The section proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the Senator from Florida will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the several circuit courts of the United States shall have and exercise no jurisdiction in cases of appeals or writs of error from the district courts allowed, taken, or sued out after the 1st day of September, 1882, except that reviews in bankruptcy cases, in the exercise of their supervisory jurisdiction, may be had as heretofore provided.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Before the Senator from Kansas proceeds, I wish to ask a question. I am not now familiar with the practice as to writs of error. I cannot recall to my mind the cases where the circuit court issues writs of error to the district court. I know appeals lie in admiralty cases, but I cannot now recall to my mind the particular cases where writs of error issue. There may be some difficulty about that.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida, with that candor which always adorns his discourse, frankly admits that his criticisms on this bill are based on his ignorance of it and not on his knowledge of it. And that is the difficulty which the supporters of the bill encounter in endeavoring to answer his arguments. They assume themselves to know something about it; they have examined the matter with as much assiduity as their humble abilities enabled them to give it, and when they offer the reasons why it should be passed, the Senator from Florida, in his discursive rambles among the sections, admits that he is practically unfamiliar with its provisions, and wants to know if we cannot do something better.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Perhaps the Senator can tell me the cases where a writ of error lies from the circuit to the district court.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not discussing that proposition at this time.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is the point on which you were asked to answer me.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator also alludes, and I do not now know whether he insists upon an amendment in furtherance of his suggestion, that turpitude and degradation and personal debasement would characterize the action of the judiciary if they were allowed to certify to the amount of expenses they incurred.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No such language escaped my lips.

Mr. INGALLS. No; but that is the irresistible inference.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Your inference.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator argues that to permit the section to stand as reported by the committee would result in some collusion between the bench and the officers——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I deny that.

Mr. INGALLS. By which their terms would be protracted and unjust compensation extorted. Mr. President, all human institutions are based upon the idea that there is faith and honor and honesty in human nature; that men under ordinary circumstances will be honest; that officers sworn to do their duty will, to the best of their ability, discharge it. I confess, sir, that I am unable to answer arguments which are based merely upon the fear that a given provision will result in corrupt collusion between sworn officers of justice and their ministers to protract terms of court for the petty and puerile and contemptible stipend of $10 a day. If that is the idea that the Senator has of the judiciary of this country, I can only say that I do not share it with him. I doubt if there is any officer of any court who would deliberately violate an oath and disregard his obligation for the purpose of procuring $10 per day.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I said there were such characters in human history in the past, but I said that I did not believe there were any such now.

Mr. INGALLS. That there were none such now?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes.

Mr. INGALLS. Then of course the Senator's argument falls to the ground.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I made no argument on that point.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I understand the Senator to abandon his objection to that part of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No. I said it was undignified.

Mr. INGALLS. He still adheres to the etiquette.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Florida also proceeds to say that the second section of the bill is obnoxious because there is no difficulty now in attending to all business that properly comes before the circuit court. Mr. President, the Senator is not familiar with the condition of the machinery for the administration of justice in the newer portions of the Republic. I have lived for many years in the eighth circuit. It comprises the States of Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, and Arkansas, with a population of nearly eight million. It is an empire nearly half as large as continental Europe; and to that circuit is assigned a single judge whose duties compel him to travel from Saint Paul to Little Rock, attending to several terms of court a year in those seven great States, two of which have more than one judicial district. It is simply a matter of manual impossibility for one judge to perform the duties imposed upon him in that circuit under existing laws, I care not how you may curtail the jurisdiction; and the purpose of this bill is to make such an addition to the legal machinery that was originally adapted for a community of less than twenty millions as will adapt it to a Commonwealth of more than fifty million, in which those subjects that are naturally the topic of litigation in Federal courts have expanded into colossal and almost indescribable proportions.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Can the Senator inform us how many district judges there are in that circuit?

Mr. INGALLS. There is one in Minnesota; there is one in Iowa; there are two in Missouri; there is one in Nebraska; there is one in Colorado; there is one in Kansas; and there are two in Arkansas.

Mr. BUTLER. Making nine.

Mr. INGALLS. I have not added the figures.

Mr. BUTLER. Has not every one of those district judges circuit-court powers?

Mr. INGALLS. They have unquestionably, and the district judges with whose practice I am familiar sit contemporaneously while circuit courts are being held, in other rooms in the same building, for the purpose of hearing cases that the circuit court has jurisdiction over, but with that power exercised, as it is by vigorous and competent judges, the dockets are still overburdened with business to that extent that it is not within the physical power of any circuit judge to perform the duties imposed upon him, and that must be performed by him without some additional assistance. I submit therefore, Mr. President, as one resident of a circuit that has expanded in the last few years almost immeasurably in its great property, commercial, industrial, and productive interests, we require imperatively the additional force that is given by this bill irrespective of questions of jurisdiction, about which I admit there is much that needs to be done.

Mr. BUTLER. Does not the Senator admit that if the jurisdiction were curtailed these nine district judges and one circuit judge might discharge the duties in that circuit?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from South Carolina asks a pertinent question and is entitled to a fair answer. That is a logical and legitimate consideration to press in connection with this bill, but I state as my deliberate judgment, after a protracted examination of this subject and from long familiarity as a practicing lawyer for fifteen years in that circuit, that, with what is now imposed upon those courts, curtail the jurisdiction of the Federal courts as you may, there is in the vast circuits in the West and the Northwest and the Southwest an imperative and indispensable necessity for additional machinery for the administration of justice that would then remain under the jurisdiction thus curtailed.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I will ask the Senator if he does not think that the first consideration should be the question of curtailing the jurisdiction of these courts? And if it should turn out that we could curtail the jurisdiction and regulate it in such a way as to relieve the courts, might it not possibly be that there would not be a necessity for the additional judicial force provided in this bill?

Mr. INGALLS. With my convictions on the subject, derived from such information as I have already communicated in my previous answer to the Senator, I should most unquestionably answer in the negative.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, let me ask the Senator, why have the friends of this bill so uniformly and persistently refused every effort to regulate the jurisdiction of these courts?

Mr. INGALLS. Because I believe, and those who favor the passage of this bill believe, that it is necessary first to establish the system provided by this bill for the transaction of the business that would exist irrespective of the curtailment of the jurisdiction.

Mr. BUTLER. Why, Mr. President, the Senator builds the superstructure before he puts in the foundation. I have never known a law passed organizing a court before you regulated the jurisdiction.

Mr. INGALLS. The jurisdiction is now regulated. The jurisdiction of the circuit and district courts is well defined. The Senator inquires not whether jurisdiction should be regulated, but whether more or less should be allowed, and upon that point I can speak without feeling, because I live in what has long been known as a debtor community; I live in a community that is penetrated by railroads, by corporations having their residence elsewhere than in that locality. These communities have suffered immeasurably by the exertion of what I believe to be unjustifiable encroachments on local jurisdiction by the Federal authorities. I have no hesitation in saying—and I say it to the fullest extent that has been urged by those who have insisted that jurisdiction should be curtailed—that I concur fully with what has been said. We have suffered immeasurable injury by the formidable encroachments of Federal jurisdiction upon local tribunals. It is contrary to the temper and spirit of American institutions that favor local self-government and home rule and the administration of law by certain fixed, well ascertained and defined local tribunals.

But I am not now dealing with that question. The reason why I objected and why other friends of this bill objected to the consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana was not that the subject was not important, not that it did not deserve attention, but that it had not received attention from the proper committee of this body, so that we could vote intelligently on the subject and see whether the provisions of that amendment were such as would accomplish the result desired to be attained.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire of the Senator whether he does not regard the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana as entirely germane to the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. I have no hesitation in saying that it is germane under the practices of the Senate. Anything is germane here. It would be entirely competent to attach a provision for sending another expedition to the North Pole to this bill. It is just exactly as germane as anything else that could be attached to it, but it is not germane in the sense of being the matured expression of a committee of this body upon a subject confessedly of prime importance.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that the Committee on the Judiciary have had this question under consideration; and I ask the Senator, if he can say so without impropriety, whether the committee are in a position to report on the matter, and if so, when will they report?

Mr. INGALLS. I can say only for one member of that committee without impropriety that the subject has long been under discussion and deliberation, and that so far as I am concerned I am ready to report a bill at the earliest possible moment consistent with the necessary examination of the statutes on the subject of jurisdiction as now defined by the laws, so that it may be pertinent and sensible, and one that can be passed by this body without committing some offense against what would be regarded as a legal examination of the topic.

Mr. BUTLER. Then may I ask the Senator if he does not, as a lawyer, consider that the determination of that question should naturally precede the organization of new courts?

Mr. INGALLS. I have already said twice, and I say again, that I do not; because, as I have repeated, irrespective of the question of curtailment of jurisdiction the enormous enhancement of population and business, the enormous expanse of the circuits, the enormous amount of physical endurance that is imposed upon the judges there in the mere transportation from place to place, is such that one judge cannot perform the duties.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator gives the experience only of one circuit. Has he any information as to the other eight circuits?

Mr. INGALLS. I have information about several of the other eight circuits, and similar circumstances there exist. It is impossible that the legal machinery which was adapted for the transaction of the litigation of twenty millions of people can suffice for fifty millions. It is a statement that needs no argument to carry conviction with it.

Now, Mr. President, as I have said, I have no particular pride of opinion about this bill or its provisions. I am much more solicitous that something should be done than anxious to wrangle about details of how it shall be done. I speak from the stand-point of a citizen living in a circuit and representing the people of that circuit, whose demands imperatively require the machinery provided in this bill; and I suggest to Senators who are opposing it, who believe it could be better perfected by maturer deliberation, whether or not it is not wise, when it is admitted and confessed that the necessity exists, to allow us to adopt some general scheme which, if it shall be found to work injudiciously or improperly hereafter, will be subject of course to constant revision.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Kansas complains of the Senator from Florida that he does not understand this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Oh no, Mr. President, I did not complain of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Oh yes, he said we were all ignorant of it over here, and the whole light belonged to the Judiciary Committee; I suppose that was it.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Florida frankly confessed——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No, I did not.

Mr. INGALLS. He confessed, with a candor that is a conspicuous decoration of his nature, that he was not as familiar with this bill as he wanted to be, and that he was really asking for information.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I said——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must understand who occupies the floor. Does the Senator from Alabama yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I said, in that candid spirit for which the Senator from Kansas has given me so much credit, that I needed a little legal light, and as the author of this bill was not present in the Senate and the Senator seemed to take his place and he being a member of the Judiciary Committee, I did not know where I could better obtain instruction than from him. I asked him in that same candid spirit to tell me in what case or cases it was that a writ of error, according to the course of the common law, lay from a judgment of the district court to the circuit court of the United States. I said that I had been a little while away from the active duties of the profession and had forgotten about the practice of the Federal courts in that respect; but inasmuch as I saw the term "writ of error" mentioned in this section which I moved to strike out, and I was not able to recall to my mind the particular cases in which that writ lies from the circuit to the district court of the United States, I asked the distinguished member of the Judiciary Committee to inform me as to that point. Surely there was nothing improper in that. I did not get an answer. That was all the ignorance there was about it. I was aware that appeals lay from a decree in admiralty to the circuit court, but I could not recall to mind the cases in which a writ of error lay at common law.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand the Senator from Florida to say he did not get light from the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I did not.

Mr. MORGAN. That was because the Senator from Kansas did not have the light, and because he has not paid as much attention to some of the details of the bill as some of us who have felt more interest in it. I do not understand it myself. I have no doubt that is my fault. I have given the best energies of my life since I was sixteen years old to studying law, and I cannot understand the bill. The Judiciary Committee seem not to understand it. They do not agree about it. Yesterday I called the attention of the Senate to some disagreement about the meaning of the tenth section. The committee do not seem to agree about it at all.

When the Senator from Florida asked the Senator from Kansas for an explanation or a statement of the cases in which an appeal or writ of error would lie from the district to the circuit court he did not vouchsafe an answer. The Judiciary Committee ought to be more liberal with us than this. When we call for light we of course expect to receive it; and it is rather a dark time when the Judiciary Committee, having their light, do not give us the benefit of it.

The Senator from Florida moves to strike out the second section of this bill. I hope he will amend that motion by proposing something as a substitute for it. The second section of this bill deprives the circuit courts of the United States of the jurisdiction of appeals or writs of error from the district court, "except that reviews in bankruptcy cases, in the exercise of their supervisory jurisdiction, may be had as heretofore provided." It takes away an existing jurisdiction in the circuit courts of the United States to try upon writ of error or appeal all cases from the district courts of the United States unless the amount involved shall be in excess of $500. That is the effect of this section.

The statute as it exists, the statute that is repealed by this second section of this proposed bill is as follows:

SEC. 631. From all final decrees of a district court in causes of equity or of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, except prize causes, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of $50, exclusive of costs, an appeal shall be allowed to the circuit court next to be held in such district, and such circuit court is required to receive, hear, and determine such appeal.

SEC. 633. Final judgments of a district court in civil actions, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of $50, exclusive of costs, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in a circuit court, holden in the same district, upon a writ of error.

There is the appellate jurisdiction given in all equity causes and in all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, except prize causes, and in all civil actions at common law brought in a district court of the United States, where the sum in controversy, exclusive of interests and costs, exceeds $50. The present bill limits the right of appeal or the right to a writ of error in all civil causes where the sum in controversy determines the right to $500. That is to say, the people who may sue or be sued in the district courts of the United States, in equity or at law, have a right of appeal or a writ of error to the circuit court of the United States, upon a judgment or decree, for any sum exceeding $50. The bill takes that right away. That may be a small matter in the contemplation of the Judiciary Committee, for not only in that feature but in every feature of this bill it is devised, if not intended, only for the protection and benefit of the rich.

You cannot under this bill take an appeal from the judgment of the court of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States, a court guaranteed in the Constitution to the people, unless the sum in controversy in many of the cases exceeds $10,000, exclusive of interest and costs. The right of appeal by this bill is entirely abrogated in all sums under $500. I call the attention of gentlemen in this Senate who propose to administer justice equally between all classes of people to the fact that this bill takes away the right of every man to an appeal or writ of error to any court where the sum in controversy is less than $500, and gives to every man a right of appeal to the Supreme Court in any cause whatsoever, that may get into this appellate court, where the sum in controversy is in excess of $10,000.

Mr. President, while we are legislating here, let it be understood that this body is not entirely independent of the people. Sir, I would rather raise my voice in this honorable body in behalf of the poorest man in the United States who had lost his rights by the false judgment of any of the Federal tribunals up to the sum of $500 than to be found here pandering to the rich and the powerful in this land and giving them the right of appeal to the court of ultimate resort merely because the sum of $10,000 or upward was involved in the suit.

I do not expect to get the attention of the Senate upon this question. They have long since made up their minds that no appeal made in favor of the rights of the people in this country shall be tolerated when that appeal in any degree interferes with the powerful corporations or the wealthier classes. Mr. Vanderbilt can come here with a sum of $10,000 and upward and litigate his cause in a court of the United States, and take an appeal if he should lose it; it would not be to him more than to lose the silver trappings on the harness of the horses that draw his carriage to lose or gain a suit for $10,000, whereas a man who has not got $10,000 worth of property, whose whole fortune may be involved in a controversy about $5,000, is denied, under this bill, the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States against any injustice that he may suffer.

Sir, what was that Supreme Court made for? Whom was it made for? The men who ordained the Constitution, on an average, were not themselves worth $10,000 each. You bring in a bill for the relief of the Supreme Court of the United States, that you may take off their shoulders the burden of the labor imposed on them by law, and to do justice alike to the poor and the rich, and you deny to a man in the same bill the right of appeal to any court whatever if the sum in controversy is not over $500, and tell him to accept the judgment, it may be of a corrupt district judge, without appeal.

Our fathers, when they gave the jurisdiction of appeals to the circuit courts of the United States, said that every man against whom a judgment might be rendered at law or in equity where the sum in controversy exceeded $50 should have the right to an appeal to the circuit court. That right has stood upon our statute-book since the ordination of the judicial system. It has protected many a man in his rights. It has prevented the hard hand of tyranny from coming down upon men who happened to be poor.

Now, this bill proposes to wipe out that right absolutely, to give nothing in the place of it. It can never be done until this country understands what you are doing. This bill can never pass until the people of this land understand that the Senate of the United States deprives them of the right of appeal to the higher courts in cases involving controversies not exceeding $500, and at the same time gives to the man who happens to control large amounts of money and property, and to the vast corporations of this land, the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States merely in consideration of the amount of wealth they have involved in their controversies.

Senators may think they are proceeding over a smooth road in this matter, but they will find when they come to account with the people on this question that they have got a hard road to travel, that there is many a dangerous obstruction in it, and that these rights you are trying to break down in the hands of the people of this country will assert themselves at the ballot-box and elsewhere. They will not permit you to deal with them as men who are to be denied justice on account of their poverty, while you are dealing with the rich, and powerful, and great as men who are entitled to all the benefits and all the delays of the law, merely because they happen to have controversies in which $10,000 and upward are involved.

Now, sir, I am speaking upon the statutes of the United States. I charge the friends of this bill to-day with the deliberate intention and purpose, expressed on the face of the bill itself, of depriving every man in the United States who may be sued in a district court and against whom a judgment may be obtained there, whether at law or in equity, of the right of appeal to any superior tribunal as it now exists by the law, and has existed for almost a century, unless the sum in controversy shall amount to $500, exclusive of interest and costs.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

Mr. MORGAN. I am very glad to be able to provoke even a question from the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. HOAR. I want to know if you can bring suit under the present law unless the matter involves $500?

Mr. MORGAN. Not in a circuit court. You can in a district court.

Mr. HOAR. Is the Senator speaking of the district court?

Mr. MORGAN. I am talking about that court that stands nearest to the people. I am talking about that Federal court in which small sums are drawn into controversy. I am not talking about this magnificent court intended for the millionaires and capitalists and corporations. I am talking about the people's court, the district court of the United States, designed and intended for them, because it gave jurisdiction in any amount in any sort of suit within Federal jurisdiction where the sum involved exceeded $50. And they have not only the right to trial in that court for sums exceeding $50, but they will also have the right until this bill shall take it away, of appeal or writ of error from the judgment of the district court to the circuit court of the United States in all cases where the sum in controversy exceeds $50, exclusive of interest and costs. We are erecting grand tribunals for the rich and the powerful. We want to appoint eighteen judges here at a salary of $6,000 each per annum; we want to appoint eighteen clerks; we want to have eighteen marshals; we want to erect additional court-houses in towns where they have not got them, and allow ten dollars a day for expenses, to include wine and cigars for each judge of the court of appeals, to try causes where the amount in controversy shall exceed $500.

You close the door of justice upon the men who need justice to protect them against the power of money and the aggressions of tyranny, and open the door to the men who have got the money to corrupt judges and courts, if they can be corrupted. You deny justice according to the Constitution to the people who have enjoyed these rights for nearly a century; and tax the people to pay the expense of all this enormous addition to the expenses of the courts of the country.

You tax the laboring people of this land to pay these heavy stipends to the judges and the daily expenses of these courts for the rich and the great; and while you do that you turn around and say they shall not have an appeal even from a judge of the district court unless the amount in controversy exceeds $500. To get that privilege you will not allow them to go to the capitals of their own State to have their cases heard. Their counsel must travel across great circuits to reach the court of appeals. Here is Colorado on the west and Missouri on the east of a circuit, and Arkansas on the south and Minnesota on the north. Saint Louis is on the eastern border of this great circuit, and that is made the place to which the people of that circuit must go to have their causes heard. A man's lawyer must go there or else he must employ a new one. He must employ perhaps a high-priced lawyer—the lawyer resides in the city of Saint Louis; he must therefore be a high-priced man, whether he is a good lawyer or not—to try his cause coming from Colorado, although the sum involved in it may be only $500.05; and if he cannot afford to do that he must abandon his rights. Why not give us a court of appeals in each of the States at the capital thereof?

Let some member of the honorable Judiciary Committee answer that. The answer is obliged to be that it would be too inconvenient for the judges. There can be no other answer made to the question. We lose sight of all the rights of the people. We legislate as if we were legislating for provinces, for satrapies, and not for the people of this country, who furnish all the power that gives it life and all the money that supports it.

This bill spurns the people. It takes from them rights which have been consecrated by the wisdom of our fathers, and prostrates them to the power of money and capital, for that power is all the Senate is undertaking to provide for in this bill. I regret that I am compelled to speak of this bill in these terms; but, sir, the measure demands it. We have endeavored to put amendment after amendment on the bill, in the hope that we could get it in such shape that we can support it, because we acknowledge the necessity of some relief; but it is a duty required at our hands that before the court shall have relief we shall see that the people shall not be deprived of important rights that they have enjoyed for nearly a century.

The demand is made here that the judiciary of the United States shall not only stand above the States and absorb the jurisdiction of their courts, as the honorable Senator from Kansas candidly admitted they were doing, to "the immeasurable wrong," as he said, 'of the people of the different States," but while we are doing that we must deny access to the courts—for that is the meaning of it all—for the prosecution of an appeal to which every man is as equally entitled as he is entitled to the air he breathes.

There is not in our system of jurisprudence in any State, Territory, or district of the United States a principle which cuts a man off from his right of appeal from the decision of the judge or the tribunal which acts upon the case in the first instance, unless it may be in cases in reference to which it is said de minimis non curat lex. A sum is fixed in the statutes of every State in the Union, in every statute of the United States, commencing back in 1789, which shall be the lowest amount to which an appeal or writ of error shall apply. It was fixed in the statute from the district to the circuit at $50.

To deny a man the right to an appeal, by placing the value of the appeal or the amount in controversy so high that the interest he has got in the lawsuit does not reach to that sum, is to deny him a plain constitutional right. I will never make myself a party to it in the creation of an intermediate court of appeal or to get anything else done in this country, because the rights that belong to all people, without respect to persons, under the Constitution, are those to which I owe my first allegiance and fidelity. After they are provided for I will then look after the interests of those who are rich and great, and who may therefore have some peculiar and powerful claims upon our consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will ask the Senator, if he will permit me, in the line of his argument, if it is not of as much consequence to the citizens of the respective States that they should have the right to reach the Supreme Court of the United States as that the citizen of any State should have the right to prosecute his action in the circuit courts of the United States against the citizen of another State? And if relief were sought by restricting that jurisdiction at the other end, would it not be as effectual as in the manner proposed?

Mr. MORGAN. It is of much greater consequence, for the reason that the judges in the State courts reside among the people and know them; the people understand them also; but in the Federal courts the judges come from abroad. We have now one circuit judge in the fifth circuit, in which I reside, a very excellent gentleman, an able lawyer, the circuit reaching from the Rio Grande to the Atlantic, and including Florida. Where that gentleman was born I do not know. Perhaps not one-thousandth part of the citizens of that circuit ever saw him or ever will see him. To many parts of the circuit he is an utter stranger. So with many of the district judges. The people know very little about them.

It is said in the Scriptures that "when the stranger sitteth in the seat of judgment the people mourn." That has been too much the case with us. Our lamentations have gone up to Heaven, but they have never been able to reach the ears of the Senate and House of Representatives, or the Republican party in this country.

There is every reason why we should have the right of appeal in Federal tribunals, because if one stranger having no sympathy with us gives judgment against us wrongfully, we at least ought to have an opportunity of trying another to see if he will not reverse the judgment and do justice. There is far greater reason why the right of appeal should apply to the Federal tribunals than to any other tribunals in the United States. The people cannot protect themselves otherwise than by having at least two chances of getting a man who will give a right judgment in matters of this kind.

Since 1879 we have had the right to a writ of error in certain criminal causes from the circuit courts to the district courts.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to ask the Senator another question. Is there not a security for justice arising from the very preeminence of the Supreme Court of the United States, whose opinions and judgments are canvassed by the entire country, beyond any security that can possibly be derived from a court that is circumscribed by the limits of a judicial circuit?

Mr. MORGAN. That is true. That was the intention, but the Congress of the United States has never provided for the exercise by the Supreme Court of the appellate jurisdiction it was intended to exert, for they have always allowed the Supreme Court to decide all questions of property and money and debt that came within the purview of its jurisdiction as arranged by Congress, but never have allowed that court to try any case on writ of error to a Federal court which involved a man's life or liberty.

It was not until March 3, 1879, that there was any statute in the United States which authorized a defendant in a criminal case to an appeal from any judge who tried and condemned him. There is a statute which authorizes the transfer of capital cases from the district to the circuit court, but when a man is condemned in the circuit court he must undergo the condemnation without the right of appeal. In 1879, however, it was enacted that:

> The circuit court for each judicial district shall have jurisdiction of writs of error in all criminal cases tried before the district court where the sentence is imprisonment or fine and imprisonment, or where, if a fine only, the fine shall exceed the sum of $300; and in such case a respondent, feeling himself aggrieved by a decision of a district court, may except to the opinion of the court, and tender his bill of exceptions, which shall be settled and allowed according to the truth, and signed by the judge, and it shall be a part of the record of the case.
> SEC. 2. Within one year next after the end of the term at which such sentence shall be pronounced, and not after, the respondent may petition for a writ of error from the judgment of the district court in the cases named in the preceding section, which petition shall be presented to the circuit judge or circuit justice in term or vacation, who, on consideration of the importance and difficulty of the questions presented in the record, may allow such writ of error, and may order that such writ shall operate as a stay of proceedings under the sentence; but the allowance of such writ shall not so operate without such order.

This gives no right to review any judgment in a capital case.

It is attempted to carry into this bill this same proposition, that a man shall not be entitled to a writ of error upon conviction in a criminal cause unless the judge of the superior court upon an examination of the record will allow him to have such writ. I make the broad denial that this is justice in the sense of the Constitution.

A man has a controversy about a piece of property, a bill of exchange or what not, the value of which exceeds $500, exclusive of interest and costs. He is cast in the suit. He has the positive right under the bill of the Judiciary Committee, without asking any judge for permission, to take his case to the court of appeals. A man, however, is indicted in a district court of the United States or in a circuit court of the United States, or he is even informed against without indictment. He is convicted. He is probably convicted upon a faulty indictment or under an unconstitutional law. He is fined $500 and imprisoned as long as the law will permit in a jail or penitentiary.

Torn from his family, a convicted felon, he is put in chains and carried to Albany, New York, or some distant place, there to freeze in the hard winter and to undergo all manner of humiliation. He makes his application to the judge who tried him, for this bill gives the power to even that judge to deny him a writ, and after he has done so he cannot apply to another. He makes his application for a writ of error, and the judge says: "No, I shall not grant it; you must go to the penitentiary;" and that is the end of the law to him. In the case of a judgment in a civil action against him for $500 he is given the absolute right to a writ of error or appeal to the court of appeals; but in the case of a conviction for crime, and a fine of $500 and imprisonment added, if you please, we deny him in this bill the right unless the judge shall grant it to him.

I claim that there is not in the Constitution a power anywhere to be found, by inference or otherwise, which authorizes us to say to a judge, "You may refuse to a man a writ of error where his life or his liberty and his character are at stake, but you cannot refuse it to him when his money is at stake and the sum amounts to more than $500."

It is a shameful blot upon the jurisdiction of this country that we discriminate between rights which speak in dollars and cents and those which speak in the name of humanity and humanity's God. That which is more precious to man than all other things together, his character, the liberty of his person, the honor of his family, you place entirely within the power and discretion of a judge of an appellate court; the judge may refuse him a hearing or refuse to allow any other judge to hear him, no matter how plain his case may be in the judgment of his counsel or of himself, and while doing that you price his property involved in litigation, and say if it amounts to more than $500 he shall be entitled to an appeal as a matter of right.

I will never vote for a bill which contains discriminations like that. I will never undervalue that most priceless part of a human being, his honor, his character, his liberty, and his life, so far as to put him beneath the power of any man to refuse him an appeal to a higher tribunal for the rectification of a wrong done against him, and at the same time put it in the power of a man to appeal if the amount of money in controversy exceeds $500.

Sir, there never was a generation of men born in this world who have bowed and stooped to the power of mammon like the men of this day and generation. All sense of justice to mankind, all respect for liberty, all regard for that exalted character for which men have worked throughout life, is being lost, it seems to me, to the minds and hearts of this money-loving generation of men. Put a question of money to them and they can understand it to a fraction; put a question of liberty, of character and life before them and they will higgle and hesitate before they will grant the remedies which the Constitution provides for the protection of life, liberty, and character, and then they do it sneeringly and with a toss of their heads.

Senators may say that it will not do to allow the dockets to be crowded with criminal cases, unless the judges of the appellate courts shall consent. If that be so, why not say that the dockets of the appellate courts shall not be crowded with civil cases unless the judges will consent? There you draw the line of demarkation, and I do not intend that that line shall be lost sight of. It is in this bill from bottom to top; it permeates the whole structure of the bill, and gives to it a character which I can never approve by a vote that I shall cast in the Senate.

We have a great complaint made here about the choking of the Supreme Court docket, the circuit court dockets, and the district court dockets throughout the United States. I grant you that the Supreme Court docket is almost irremediably clogged. I have but one complaint to make on the subject of that docket, which is that the judges of that court will persist in going out upon the circuit to try such causes as they may select upon the different dockets of the circuit courts of the United States, when if they were to remain here and devote the same length of time to the consideration of the appeal docket they would clear it in two years' time.

Mr. ALLISON. The law requires them to go upon the circuit.

Mr. MORGAN. Then let us repeal that law. When does the law require them to go upon the circuit?

Mr. ALLISON. At least once in two years.

Mr. MORGAN. At least once in two years. For how long? As long as they please. At what time do they go? Whenever they please. At what time do they return? Whenever they please. We leave it virtually in the discretion of the judges of the Supreme Court to go upon the circuit and try causes, because we do not fix a time that they shall sit in those courts, but merely say they must do so at least once in two years. I restate the proposition and reaffirm it, that if the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States should spend the same amount of time in Washington in trying causes upon this docket that they spend in vacation, or spend in the circuits, they would clear the docket, cumbrous as it is, in two years. If the circuit and district judges of the United States would bestow upon the different courts that they preside in as much time as the judges of the different State courts bestow upon their dockets, they would clear their dockets in two years also. But, sir, they do not do it. They have unlimited power to hold special terms, but there are not many of the circuit and district judges of the United States who spend more than four months out of twelve in actual labor in the court-house.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will state to the Senator that in the argument yesterday it was admitted that while they were made part of this new court of appeals, it was not expected that they would be able to perform any duty. I should like to know why they should be included in it at all in that view.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the very reason of it; because they are not expected to perform any duty. That is in the line of safe precedent. There are very few judges in the United States to-day who have not established the precedent thoroughly that they are not going to perform any more duties than their own tastes incline them to perform. Nobody can control them about matters of that kind, and they take their own way with it.

I want to show exactly the state of the case about these courts. In the last report of the Attorney-General of the United States it is stated:

> During the last fiscal year 2,482 civil suits were terminated; in 1,055 of these judgments were for the United States, in 222 for the defendants, and 1,205 were either dismissed or discontinued; 13 were appealed from the district to the circuit court, and 15 from the circuit to the Supreme Court.

Look at that proportion! Two thousand four hundred and eighty-two civil suits were terminated, and the appeals that were taken in those cases were thirteen from the district to the circuit court and fifteen from the circuit court to the Supreme Court.

> Many of the civil suits reported dismissed or discontinued were settled by authority of the Treasury Department and discontinued under its direction. There were pending July 1, 1881, 2,929 civil suits to which the United States was a party.

Think of that! We have one hundred and twenty-one judges of the United States courts, including the Supreme Court and the court of appeals and those in the Territories, and this report includes all who are in the Territories. We have sixty districts, including that of the District of Columbia, and adding on six in the Territories we have sixty-six districts. In all these courts there were pending July 1, 1881, 2,929 civil suits to which the United States was a party. It does not look like an immense job to dispose of that part of the business.

> There were pending July 1, 1881, 6,211 criminal prosecutions, namely, 308 for violations of customs laws, 3,104 for violations of internal-revenue laws, 276 for violations of post-office laws, 355 for prosecutions under the election laws, 158 for violations of the civil rights acts, 63 under naturalization laws, 33 under intercourse laws, 88 under pension laws, 77 for embezzlement, and 1,749 miscellaneous prosecutions.

The total is 6,211 criminal prosecutions that were pending in July, 1881.

Now we come to the cases to which the United States was not a party:

> Exhibit D is a statement of the civil suits to which the United States was not a party commenced and terminated in the circuit and district courts of the United States during the last fiscal year, and of such suits pending July 1, 1881.
> Nine thousand seven hundred and seven such suits were commenced during the year, of which 2,584 were cases in admiralty, and 7,143 were other miscellaneous suits.
> Seven thousand six hundred and three suits of this kind were terminated last year, of which 1,618 were cases in admiralty, and 5,985 were other miscellaneous suits.
> Twenty-four thousand three hundred and seventy-one civil suits to which the United States was not a party were pending in the circuit and district courts of the United States July 1, 1881, namely, 2,926 in admiralty, and 21,445 other miscellaneous suits.

I can take two States even in the South, sparsely populated as that is, and by the record of cases that are decided by the judges of the criminal courts, the equity courts, the common law courts, and the supreme courts of those States, I can show you more cases in those two States pending on the 1st day of last July than are shown by this report of the Attorney-General to be pending in all the sixty-one districts of the United States. I can show you more cases decided and determined in these two States than have been determined by all the Federal judges.

Take the two States of Mississippi and Alabama. Mississippi has about the same judicial arrangement with Alabama, having, I think, about the same number of judges. We have sixty-two probate judges who hear all the cases in ordinary, and there is not a case of that sort or a case of divorce triable in the circuit courts of the United States. Then we have sixty-two circuit courts, presided over by eight judges, and we have three city courts with criminal jurisdiction in the cities of Mobile, Selma, and Montgomery, each with a single judge. We then have three chancellors and three judges on the supreme court. That is our judicial outfit; and we try about as many cases in the State of Alabama annually with eight circuit judges, three chancellors, three supreme court judges, three criminal court judges, and sixty-two probate judges as are tried, or will be tried, by the one hundred and twenty-one judges of the courts of the United States.

Some of these judges are allowing their dockets to be clogged because they will not work. The judicial tribunals of any two States having 1,500,000 each in a given year will decide more cases and perform more labor than all the judges of the Federal courts of the United States. What is the reason for this? They are chosen by the people; they are responsible to the people. They have got somebody to look after them while they are holding office. They cannot go about over the world at will and pleasure, holding as many courts as they please and as few, and sitting as short a time as suits their convenience, without responsibility to somebody.

Here we are to have one hundred and twenty-one judges in the United States, practically without anybody to control them, no more responsible to the people of the United States than I am to the Queen of Great Britain for my conduct in the Senate. The result is that they are coming to us continually with bills to increase their salaries, and relieve them from labor. And now we are asked to appoint eighteen judges, with a salary of $6,000 each, and to furnish the paraphernalia of a great judicial system entirely new, all for the reason that they are not held responsible for their conduct to the people upon whom they are to be fastened, and to whom they acknowledge no responsibility. Then when they arrive at a certain age they are retired from the bench upon civil pensions for life. They hold their offices for life, and when they get to the age of seventy, although they may be in the possession of all their powers and faculties, they are retired from the bench gracefully and repose upon full salaries to the end of their lives.

Sir, it is time that we had commenced to understand that if the judges of this country do not owe responsibility to the people the Senate owes them some. There is no day that will ever dawn upon my mind which will be so bright and so full of happiness in respect to the affairs of this country as that day on which the people will assert themselves against Senators here and against members of the House, and require them to take some interest in their affairs, and some care of their money, their rights, and their liberties.

Sir, I denounce this bill again, and I do it upon the facts appearing upon its face. I denounce it before the people as a bill gotten up in the interests of the rich, in the interests of the great corporations and capitalists of the country, against the men whose rights are stricken down by it. Whatever the intention may have been it is not for me to say; I judge it by what it provides. When I find that the second section takes away the right of appeal which now exists up to the sum of $500, and when no case decided in an appellate court goes to the Supreme Court unless the controversy involves more than $10,000, I cannot mistake its meaning. Senators may varnish it over as much as they will; they may plead the necessity for a court of appeals as loudly as they please, but while they are providing this arrangement for the convenience of judges let them at least allow the rights now secured to the people by statute to remain undisturbed by this bill.

It is that which has led me to speak against this bill. I am willing to go to any reasonable extent that any Senator here will go to provide for the convenient and speedy dispatch of the public business of the United States.

While we are required to pay our portion of the burden of this great expense, I do not want to see the rights that now exist in behalf of the people of Alabama under the statutes of the United States abridged. Neither do I wish to be compelled to see an Alabamian go to Judge Bruce after he has unjustly convicted him, as he has unjustly convicted some men, and upon his bended knee present his petition and ask him for the privilege of an appeal to the court of appeals to review that decision. I do not want that humiliation and shame to be brought upon a proud-spirited Alabamian.

I have shown to the Senate that he has no respect for the rights of men or officers in that State. I have shown to the Senate that he took the judge of probate of Chambers County, as venerable a man as any that I know, and, contrary to law, locked him in the common jail of Montgomery County, and prevented him from discharging most important judicial functions as an officer of that State for the period of time from the middle of November to the last of January, and that, too, without any more authority than the President of the Senate would have now to order me into custody and to be locked in a dungeon.

Sir, we seem to pass over events of that sort without its producing a ripple upon the surface of our complacency. The Senate of the United States would disdain to be agitated about a matter of that kind. When a Senator objects to such a man as that being allowed to go upon the court of appeals, and to his having the power there to extend his persecutions over the people, a solid majority on the other side of the Chamber stands by the bill, and, so far as I can understand, for no better reason than because it gives the power of appointing eighteen additional judges to the President. They do not answer arguments, they do not pretend to respond to any objection that is made to the bill, they vote often and early and late, always for the bill and against every amendment, notwithstanding we point out serious objections to it. Senators who were upon the committee do not construe the bill alike, and notwithstanding we show that it prostrates liberties and rights that now exist in behalf of the people, both under the criminal and civil laws of the United States, the Senators on the other side stand solidly by the bill and refuse all amendments.

This only convinces me that the power of party fealty and allegiance in this country is stronger than any other power in it. We attempt to prevent the recurrence of acts like that by which Judge Bruce imprisoned Judge Rowland, and that is refused. This judge must in due course of rotation go upon the court of appeals, although he took this old man and locked him in that prison and prevented any one from discharging the duties that belonged to his office in Chambers County from the middle of November until the last of January; for it turns out that under the constitution and laws of Alabama no provision has been made for a substitute for a probate judge. The estates of dead men, the affairs of orphan children, and the thousand administrative duties that belong to a judge of probate, with which he is loaded under the status of our State, matters of the most important consequence, not to the people of a county alone, but to the entire State, are all neglected while the judge was in jail. The court was broken up and a man who had within the range of his jurisdiction as much power as a judge of the district court of the United States was taken from his bench and sent to jail in consequence of a decision which he rendered upon his oath and upon his conscience as a judge, which decision the Supreme Court of the United States said was right.

Suppose Judge Rowland should bring his action against Judge Bruce, Judge Bruce would say: "I was acting as a district judge of the United States, and it was my judgment that I had a right to imprison him." The probate judge would say in reply to him: "I was acting as judge of the court of county commissioners, and it was my judgment that I did what I did rightly upon my oath as a judge; you imprisoned me by a false judgment because I made a right one, and therefore I think I have a right of action against you." The Supreme Court of the United States would say: "No, you have got no such right of action; you have got no remedy." There is no remedy in such a case but to prevent the recurrence of the wrong.

Mr. President, you must pardon me for speaking out plainly about matters of this kind. I know where the trouble is, and how States as well as people are made to suffer under the usurpations of authority and power by the Federal judges, and I must protest against it. I am totally opposed to any measure which increases that power and enables this class of men to go upon the bench. Other Senators may find it proper in their own estimation to vote for such a bill; I cannot. I hope that the Senator from Florida will modify his amendment, not by striking out the section merely, but by preserving to the people both in civil and criminal cases the right of appeal.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will state that I was at first in doubt as to what would be the effect of the amendment should it prevail. After reflection I have thought that it would leave the litigants intended to be benefited by the amendment without any remedy; so I have prepared a substitute to come in in place of the section, should it be stricken out, which secures the right of appeal in all cases over $50 and under $500, in admiralty, in accordance with the present existing law.

Mr. MORGAN. The Judiciary Committee reported this bill to the Senate, and it is assumed, not asserted, that they are a unit in favor of it. No report accompanies it. No Senator, except the Senator in charge of the bill, has much to say about it. One of the Senators, the honorable Senator from Arkansas who sits upon my left, [Mr. GARLAND,] I notice has voted to put some amendments upon it, and very properly so. It must not be understood, giving to the Judiciary Committee as much prestige as you will, that this is a bill which has the full approval of every member of that committee. I was asked by an honorable Senator yesterday belonging to the committee, who is not in his seat to-day, if I would not propose an amendment to the bill by striking out a part of it. The part which he wants stricken out is on page 9, section 10, and is in these words:

> But in the two last-mentioned cases the court of appeals shall state the specific question arising upon the construction of the Constitution, or the construction or the validity of such treaty or law, or the specific legal question that the adjudication involves, and such questions only shall be certified to and finally decided by the Supreme Court.

Unquestionably that clause ought to be stricken out. I refer to this now merely to show that it is not the judgment of the entire Judiciary Committee that the bill should pass just as it is. Where is the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who is one of the acknowledged leaders in the Senate, and who for a long time has presided with distinguished ability over the Judiciary Committee? Does he raise his voice in support of this bill? Will any member of the Judiciary Committee undertake to say that that Senator favors any part of the bill? It may be, for reasons which I know nothing of, that the Senator does not conceive it to be his duty to participate in the efforts to break the bill down or to amend it, but I think no member of the Judiciary Committee will rise in his place and say that the honorable Senator from Vermont ever favored the passage of this bill.

I assume that the Judiciary Committee are not represented in this body as a unit in favor of the bill. If I am mistaken in that, let some one correct me. I have not felt that any peculiar duty was devolved upon me with reference to it, yet I have had far more participation in the resistance to the passage of this bill than I desired, and I felt to-day impelled to give some of the reasons why I thought I was forced to do it. I had hoped that I would have the aid of some of the members of the Judiciary Committee who are opposed to some features of the bill. The honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] has opposed some features of it in able arguments. The honorable Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] while not opposing any feature of the bill, has opposed amendments that we have offered to the bill that he himself admits are necessary and proper enactments, and that the country is suffering for the want of, he taking the ground that they were not germane to the bill; but I pointed out yesterday that the first and second sections of the bill had not anything to do with a court of appeals. The first and second sections relate only to a change of the existing jurisdiction of the Federal courts, and do not touch the question of a court of appeals. You could strike out the first and second sections of the bill and the court of appeals would be just as perfect as it will be with those sections left in.

In the further discussion of this question I will offer the amendment I spoke of a while ago, which a member of the committee asked me to offer, and then, perhaps, I may have something more to say about it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy any time in the discussion of this bill, especially at this hour of the day, but there were two or three things which fell from the lips of the Senator from Alabama that I do not quite comprehend. In speaking of the conduct of the several circuit and district courts he tells us that there are 121 judges of those courts. Where does he find authority for that statement?

Mr. MORGAN. In the statutes.

Mr. ALLISON. There are but 54 district judges in the United States, 9 circuit judges, and 6 judges in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORGAN. And the judges in the Territories.

Mr. ALLISON. When the Senator read from the report of the Attorney-General with reference to those courts, he read a statement of the courts that are under the control of those 54 judges and have no relation to the Territorial courts of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I said the Federal judges numbered 121, including of course the 18 that will be put upon the bench by this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. There are now 54 United States district court judges; there are 9 circuit court judges; and then there are the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. There are 54 district judges, 9 circuit judges, 6 judges of the courts of the District of Columbia, 9 Supreme Court judges, the 18 to be added by this bill, and 25 Territorial judges.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator includes the 25 Territorial judges scattered over the ten Territories of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I do it because this bill gives the right of appeal from them to the proposed court of appeals. That is the reason why I include them.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. Now, I undertake to say in response to the statement made by the Senator from Alabama, that if we except the fifth judicial circuit, which he says extends from the western boundary of our territory in Texas to the Atlantic, there is not a circuit in the United States to-day that is not overwhelmed with business. In another committee of this body there is pending a bill looking to the establishment of an entirely independent court for the purpose of deciding questions that arise under our customs laws, and why? Because in the circuits including New York and Boston, and other ports where there is a large amount of imported goods, the Federal courts are so crowded that it is almost impossible to secure a decision of cases involving the revenues of the United States.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Are the courts of the States in those circuits also crowded, and have they not concurrent jurisdiction in nearly every such case with the Federal tribunals?

Mr. ALLISON. I speak with reference to the States of which I have knowledge. In the State in which I live every State court is crowded. While it is true that they may have in many instances concurrent jurisdiction, yet under our existing statutes the Federal courts in my own State are so crowded that, so far from having the right of appeal, litigants are practically denied justice. A case is commenced there this year, and it is not heard in many instances for three years. Then, if the amount involved exceeds $5,000, the party litigant defeated has the poor privilege of appealing his case to the Supreme Court of the United States, where it lies three years longer before it can be reached and decided; so that there are six years from the beginning to the ending of a litigated case in my State, with all the advantages taken at every term of the court.

Mr. BUTLER. Does not a large part of this litigation arise from the cases of corporations, insurance companies, railroad companies, &c.?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly; the whole of this litigation arises under the statutes of the United States and under the Constitution of our country. The circuit courts in my State and in my circuit do not take up jurisdictional questions that the law does not authorize them to consider.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore, as we stand to-day, there is a denial of justice instead of a postponement there, practically.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, if the jurisdiction were curtailed to some extent, (I do not mean to such an extent as to impair the efficiency of the Federal courts, but if it should be curtailed and regulated,) does the Senator not think that the business would be very largely decreased in those courts?

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt that the jurisdiction might be so curtailed as to relieve the Federal courts of a portion of their jurisdiction; but even when that is done the new and growing States of the Northwest and of the western portion of our country cannot get on unless there is an additional number of judges provided. Take the eighth judicial circuit, which extends from Minnesota to Arkansas, presided over by Judge McCrary, in which is the city of Saint Louis; it would require a circuit judge to sit during every day in the year to transact the business that arises in that great city and in the State of Missouri.

Mr. BUTLER. Then, does not the Senator think the difficulty would be very largely relieved by dividing it and cutting that circuit up, making it smaller?

Mr. ALLISON. That might be a remedy, but it is not the remedy proposed. It is proposed, instead of dividing the circuits, that there shall be two additional judges in each circuit. The circuits, according to the presumption of the existing statutes, require the presence at least once in two years of a judge of the Supreme Court, and until you increase the number of the judges of the Supreme Court they are not expected to go into more than one circuit. In that circuit, I undertake to say in the presence of the Senate, with a reasonable curtailment of jurisdiction, the addition of two circuit judges would not be sufficient to hold courts there as they ought to be held by circuit judges.

The Senator from Alabama spent much of his time in speaking of a great right of appeal. Does he not know that under existing law if a man commences a suit or is sued in the circuit court of the United States for an amount between the sum of $500 and $5,000 there is no appeal? In all that vast class of cases between $500 and $5,000, under existing law, no man has more than one trial; and instead of having that trial before a circuit judge, in nine cases out of ten, because of the pressure of the business of the circuit judge, the trial is had before one single district judge only, from which there is no appeal.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Iowa makes me responsible for raising the sum from $2,000 to $5,000.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the existing law, and the Senator's argument in favor of the right of appeal is the strongest argument that has yet been made in favor of the general provisions of this bill, that we should have an appellate court where a man may have more than one trial and more than one judge who will sit upon his property or his life or his liberty. Yet the Senator from Alabama deprecates the passage of this bill wherein it proposes to remedy the very evil which he speaks against.

The bill is necessary not only for the purpose of relieving the Supreme Court, as has been said over and over again, but it is necessary, as far as I know, in every part of this country to enable the circuit courts to be held and presided over by circuit judges and not by district judges, who are already overwhelmed with work in their district courts. Therefore it is that those of us who live in the northwestern portion of this country and have felt this pressure, as we have in every State of the Northwest, have welcomed this bill and its authors, whoever they may be, as a measure of relief from the great burdens which have borne us down for the last five or six years with reference to litigation which we are compelled to have in the circuit courts of the United States.

I am amazed, I confess, to find Senators in the South and Southwest opposing this measure. I cannot believe that they oppose it on partisan grounds. Do they fear that these eighteen judges are to be selected wholly from the Republican party? I say here as a member of the Senate that if these eighteen judges be added to the judiciary of the country, I for one would give a portion of them to the other dominant party of this country.

Mr. MORGAN. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that, so far as I am concerned, if the eighteen judges to be appointed are as good judges and as upright as Don Pardee, the Republican circuit judge in my circuit, I shall be content without asking the question whether they are Democrats or Republicans.

Mr. ALLISON. I am very glad to hear the Senator say so. I have been afraid, with all respect to my friend, that his prejudice against the district judge in his own State has had very much to do with his hostility to the Federal system. I am happy myself to bear testimony to the fact that in the State in which I live for more than twenty-four years the district court has been presided over by a Democrat from the State of Virginia, and a more upright and able judge, in my belief, does not exist in the United States. We have no partisan feeling there and no personal feeling with reference to the men who hold these judicial positions.

Mr. McMILLAN. In my own State, the district judge, occupying a seat upon the bench ever since the organization of the State, is and has been a Democrat, a son of Mr. Justice Nelson.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt the United States district judges in both those States are excellent; and the fact that they are Democrats is a blessing to those people.

Mr. ALLISON. We have no partisanship there in our courts; we have no partisanism in any of the Federal courts of the United States, and our people are strangers to this class of discussion. This bill may need amendment; I do not say it is a perfect bill, although the bills which come from the Judiciary Committee are generally nearly perfect. But this is not like a law of the Medes and Persians. If it shall prove ineffectual in some respects, can it not be amended next year?

The Senator from Alabama called our attention to the fact that since the foundation of this Government up to March 3, 1879, there was no appeal in criminal cases. It was by the action of a Republican Senate (perhaps the Democracy happened to be in power just at the moment in the other branch) that only since 1879 could a man tried for his life or liberty in a Federal court go to any other court with and appeal in his case. That exists in a limited way now in the circuit courts, and if I read this bill aright, that right of appeal is protected and preserved fully in this bill, and is not taken from by a hair's breadth.

If this bill is not all the Senator from Alabama wishes it to be, I appeal to him in all fairness to relieve those sections of our country which are oppressed by these overburdened dockets and are not only delayed in securing justice which they are entitled to, but are absolutely deprived of it. This bill holds out to them a hope of reasonable relief.

That is all I desire to say with reference to this question at this time.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at six o'clock and eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 9, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHELLEY. I ask, by unanimous consent, Mr Speaker, to introduce some bills for reference.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will be compelled, in justice to several gentlemen who wish to speak on the Agricultural Department bill, to object to everything out of order. The debate on that bill is to close at two o'clock to-day, and I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House resumes the consideration of the special order, which is the bill (H. R. No. 4429) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the discussion of this question, and to the presentation which has been made of the importance of extending greater consideration by Congress to the agricultural interest of the people. It has been well said that it is the largest and most important of all our material interests; that more persons are engaged in it, more dependent on it for their livelihood than on any other avocation.

I agree, sir, that it ought to receive greater consideration than it has heretofore received; that it ought to have an officer at the head of the department of first-class ability, whose talents, labor, and resources should be devoted to the development of agricultural interests and to the promotion of the agricultural welfare of the country.

In the remarks I make I propose to advocate the adoption of the substitute presented by the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. KENNA,] which combines in the same department agriculture and commerce. This would involve the transfer to the new department of the Bureau of Agriculture from the Interior Department and the transfer to the new department of several bureaus in the Treasury Department, relating to statistics, to commerce, and some other matters. At present the Secretary of the Treasury is charged with the management of several bureaus of the public service entirely disconnected with the Treasury Department proper. We all know whoever may be charged with the duty of managing the Treasury Department proper will have duties which may well occupy the time and command the services of the ablest intellects of the country.

It is, in my judgment, true he should not be charged with other duties disconnected with the Treasury, which may, as they are now, be confided to bureau officers, with but little supervision from the head of the Department.

The substitute I am advocating increases the several bureaus which it is intended shall be transferred from the Treasury Department to the Department of Agriculture. It will be seen they would most properly come under the supervision and control of this new department, and none of them connect themselves directly with the duties of the Treasury Department.

The increase of expense consequent on the creation of this new department would be the salary of the secretary and the salaries of one or two assistant secretaries, as the one or the other of these bills may be adopted, with some incidental expenses I need not go into. But the transfer of the bureaus from the other Departments of the Government to this new department would not augment the public expenditures but would give a more proper, and it is to be hoped a more vigorous, administration of those branches of the public service which relate to the great agricultural and commercial interests of the country; for of all these are the most material. They affect most directly the interests of the people and their welfare. And it is to be observed that in other countries than our own, where the agricultural interests are not so great as in our own, where the commercial interests are not so great as in our own, they have put these two interests under separate departments with a view to secure their efficient and successful administration in the collection and dissemination of facts, the collection, preservation, and dissemination of statistics which shall promote and secure their posperity and welfare.

It has been claimed in the discussion that to unite in this department commerce with agriculture would be to dwarf agriculture by putting it in connection with commerce. I do not see the force or believe in the truth of this statement. Agriculture and commerce are handmaidens that do and must walk side by side with each other, the prosperity and well-doing of each depending on the prosperity and well-doing of the other. However much labor, capital, and time are devoted to agriculture, with due regard to the internal and external commerce of the United States, the fruits of that labor and capital must be largely enjoyed by commerce. It is now known, at least it was stated a few years back by the chief of the Bureau of Statistics, that our internal commerce amounted to about thirty billions of dollars annually, very largely made up of the carrying of the agricultural products of this country from the interior to the seaboard and the return of supplies furnished by the fruits of these products from the seaboard to the interior.

And it seems to me that in securing a first-class intellect to take charge of this department it is eminently proper and necessary that he should not only consider all the questions which relate to agriculture but among the chiefest of them he should consider the means of transportation, the prices of commodities, what influences those prices, the markets for them, and all those subjects which directly connect themselves with the agricultural interests of the country.

I confess that I have no fear, as some gentlemen have expressed fears on this subject, that commerce would combine to overshadow agriculture. The man selected for the head of this department could not fail to recognize that his highest duty and obligation to the people and to the country would be to look to its agricultural welfare and prosperity. We could not expect a department to be divided against itself. We could not expect a department officer to disregard one of the interests, and the greatest interest, confided to him for the purpose of giving superior advantages and superior facilities to another interest simply auxiliary to and dependent upon the first.

In this connection I desire to say that each of the bills provides the one for a secretary of agriculture to be a Cabinet officer and the other for a secretary of industries to be a Cabinet officer. Each bill provides that there shall be an assistant secretary, who shall be a practical agriculturist. Neither of them provides that the secretary shall be a practical agriculturist.

In passing I might submit a criticism upon the bill of the committee, though I will not enter into a very critical examination of it. I do not exactly see the necessity for a secretary and for an assistant secretary who shall be a practical agriculturalist, and for a bureau of agriculture, the chief officer of which shall also be a practical agriculturist. It seems to me that we are getting up to the largest figure on this organization at first; and if we have a secretary of agriculture, and if you adopt the committee's bill, a bureau of agriculture, presided over by a practical agriculturist, we might, for the present, avoid as unnecessary the expense of an assistant secretary.

If you take the substitute bill presented by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] there will perhaps be more necessity for the additional officer, because there would be a secretary of industries and a bureau of agriculture, the chief of which shall be a commissioner of agriculture and be a practical agriculturist. It also provides for a bureau of commerce. Perhaps with these two bills, having a prominent officer attached to each of these bureaus, there would not be an impropriety in calling them assistant secretaries and in giving them a great deal of prominence.

It is to be observed that the main body of the bill and the main body of the substitute are not only the same in purpose but the same in their provisions; only that the substitute offered by the gentleman from West Virginia adds to what is in the bill of the committee provisions for a bureau of commerce.

There is a feature connected with this subject to which I desire to call attention. It is the fact that by the policy of this country, partly sustained by the laws of the country, agriculture, though the most important pursuit in the country, a pursuit in which a larger number of persons are engaged and in which a greater amount of capital is invested than in any other pursuit, is essentially a degraded pursuit.

You ask how is it degraded? Not because it is not the most natural and the most noble employment in this land, for it is engaged in by the best and most sterling integrity that blesses this country; men trained to honesty, industry, and to a faithful observation of all the rights and duties of citizenship.

But I repeat that notwithstanding these facts it is a degraded vocation in this country by operation of the laws of the land. How is that? A man engaged in manufacturing is authorized to levy a contribution of about 40 per cent. upon the labor of the agriculturist. A small portion of the duty laid upon foreign merchandise goes into the Treasury. I mean a small portion of the amount that is transferred from one to another by law goes into the Treasury for the support of the Government and to pay the debt. But there is certainly five dollars transferred from one man to another without price, without consideration and unnecessarily, where one dollar goes into the Treasury.

Hence it is that when you hear gentlemen speaking here of the great prosperity of the country, they do not refer to agriculture, to this extended interest, but to some others which I shall refer to. Who is it that has capital to invest who will go into agriculture, which depends upon the price the products bear in market, and the burdens of taxation placed upon them, for the profit to be derived from it, when there are other vocations where by law a premium of not less than 40 per cent. is given to the investor?

The time has been when it would not be necessary to argue a question like this. But it now is that if a man speaks for justice and fair dealing between these interests he is either laughed at or regarded somewhat in the light of a crank. That is, if he does not subscribe to robbery as the right thing, to the oppression of the most important class of our people as the right thing, he is substantially a crank and to be laughed at.

Take the banking institutions of the country, that are given their special powers and acts of incorporation, to be used not for the benefit of the people but in combination with each other secure legislation in their own interests and directly in opposition to the interests of the public. I need not refer to annual meetings of banking officers, in which they boldly advocate those things that are directly opposed to the interests of the people and for their own selfish benefit.

Why, sir, when we undertook to remonetize silver some years ago, they and their hired newspapers denounced the men who in the interest of the people sought to remonetize silver as demagognes, as lunatics, as silver lunatics, and by every epithet that vulgarity could coin out of the English language.

While our country was at that time one of the larger debtor nations in the world, it was at the same time the largest silver-producing country in the world. Silver had been a part of our metallic money through our whole history, and a part of the world's metallic money as far back as history and tradition extend.

It was essential for us to use it as the currency, the coined money of the people, to aid in paying debts, public and private, which had been contracted on the basis of silver and gold, as it was that we should preserve the value of the wheat crops and the cotton crops of the country to the people. But these gentlemen, with their hired newspapers, denounced us as lunatics because we wished to adhere to a policy true to the interests of the people and the country, a policy which would simply deprive them of the privilege of furnishing the circulation to supply the place of the silver which they proposed to retire. They wish the profits of that much additional circulation—a purely selfish and unworthy motive. Yet because we asked for justice to the people and for a large national policy we were denounced by their hired minions as lunatics and demagognes.

Again, sir, when they made an effort to retire the legal-tender notes, commonly called greenbacks, gentlemen on this floor who then represented the people knew that at that time there was a dearth and an insufficiency of currency for the business of the country, and resisted the plan of retiring those notes. Again they were denounced as demagogues with all the choice epithets in the vulgar vocabulary of hirelings. Why? Because the bankers wanted the legal-tender notes retired so that they could get the profits on the national-bank circulation necessary to make up the deficiency in currency created by the retirement of the legal-tender notes.

Again, sir, a year ago or a little more, when this Congress was making an effort to refund the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds in 3 percents, we were denounced as demagogues and lunatics driving on to destruction. Why? Because it was not the interest of the bondholders and the bankers that the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds should be retired and the 3 percents substituted, because by this substitution they would lose a part of the interest they were receiving on the bonds deposited by them as security for the currency which they circulate and upon which they make the usual profits of bankers. It was a purely selfish purpose, limited to a few thousand bankers. And they induced a weak President to veto the bill passed by Congress for this purpose by a message as puerile as the motive for it was bad. The agriculturists had but little to say about this. They had no organized lobby, no hired newspapers to resist these policies, which looked to subordinating the interests of this country to the benefit of a few.

Now, I desire to see the agricultural interest brought forward and placed upon a proper basis, with proper regard for the rules of right; placed in such a situation that if bankers or others seek to subordinate the material interests of this country—the interests of 50,000,000 of people—to the interests of a few thousand, the blush of shame shall mantle the check of the robbers, if there is any shame left in men absorbed in selfishness, overreaching, and fraud.

Mr. Speaker, I regretted that some of the gentlemen who spoke yesterday said that if you should combine in this new department agriculture and commerce you would overshadow agriculture by commerce, and yet afford no relief in the carrying trade. But I was very glad to see by the remarks of various gentlemen yesterday that they had awakened to at least an ordinary interest in agriculture—an interest sufficient to enable them, if nothing else, to pander to the selfish interest of one particular class of people. It is very easy to advocate agriculture when you flatter the pride of a class and antagonize no other persons and no other interests. Sir, there has been a battle going on in this House for five years, in which the interests of agriculture have had an enemy, a real enemy, of power, of influence, of force, capable of returning blow for blow. Why is it that these gentlemen who are now so anxious to promote the interests of agriculture have not been willing to align themselves with those who fought the power of the railroad monopolies controlling our transportation business and levying whatever tribute their wills dictate upon the agriculture and commerce of the country?

I should have more faith in the gallantry and chivalry of men, and their devotion to the interests of the agricultural people of the country, if I could see them come forth and grapple the lion and let the skunk go by. I like to see true courage; I always admired in public or in private life a courage that will grapple real difficulties and contend with real and powerful enemies, instead of appealing to a particular class without antagonism or contest.

Sir, if you put this interest of commerce along with agriculture, you place it in a department bound to look to the interests of the people. It may be said that such a department would not be more bound to this duty than are the present officers of the Government. But by this measure you put this interest in a department peculiarly directed to look to the interests of the people, and one that must sharply present its views in the relation to these two great questions—a department that would not dare to sanction what occurred in 1880, when we had a superabundant wheat crop in the West, and when the scarcity of the crop in the East largely raised the price. At that time these transportation companies raised the tariff rates of freight from fifteen cents to forty or forty-five cents per hundred pounds; and they did so because, as they claimed, the commodity would bear it, and because they had the power to exact the increased price on these millions of bushels of grain, thus robbing the men whose toil and sweat developed the grain from mother earth and who were entitled to its profits. Who at the head of a department of agriculture and commerce would dare to sanction such robbery by one branch of his department for the benefit of another branch?

I am for putting them together now. I am for putting them under the control of law. I am for bringing them under the power of public opinion. I am in favor of calling upon the friends of the agriculturists of this country to assert and maintain their political power, and vindicate the rights of property and their interests.

This thing, Mr. Speaker, of appealing to the prejudices of a class to vote for a bill pleasing only to that class, and skulking away from the danger, shrinking from a contest with combined wealth and power, is not the manly thing to do. It is not fidelity either to truth or to the rights of the people.

I concede, sir, that agriculture has been degraded. What is the evidence of it? It is that it is in the power of protectionists, of bankers, and of railroads. It is that this day, although a most wholesome and honorable employment, all our young men seek something else, some other avocation among the protected interests, and feel if they go into the pursuit of agriculture they are not marching in the path of honor or promotion, but going down to a place of degradation.

Why, sir, should this be so? Agriculture, in all ages esteemed one of the most honorable employments, has by the laws, by the policy, by the sanction of public opinion been degraded until it has come that the man who works in the field has lower wages, less chance of profit, less chance of making distinction and promotion than any other. This comes from the fact that the agricultural interests of the country have not combined as they should, that they have not vindicated their rights, that they have not asserted their power. My hope is to see a department of agriculture and commerce, officered in the interest of these pursuits, conducted in their interest, developing the statistics, developing the scientific information, developing the material resources that are connected with these two great branches of industry and business.

I have had to speak, Mr. Speaker, in the midst of other cares, without time to mature such thoughts as I would desire to mature and present in the discussion of this most important question. I have had only time and opportunity to foreshadow the feelings which must pervade the mind of every man in this country who looks impartially to the country's interests and the rights of the American people. In doing so in this imperfect way, and in the hurry of other business, if I have failed to do my duty, let it be attributed to want of time to do that duty as this great subject deserves, but not to the absence of will.

To insist on promoting agriculture without at the same time promoting commerce is, in my judgment, to degrade commerce, which is so intimately and so necessarily interwoven with agriculture. Let us take up these two great interests. Let us address ourselves to the interests of the American people. Let us seek to do justice. Then let us go one step further, and after we have done justice to agriculture and commerce, let us take up some one of the great measures now pending before this Congress, struggling for existence and stifled in ways I do not wish to dwell on now, during three or four sessions of Congress, and assert the rights of the people to control these corporations. Not to do them injustice, Mr. Speaker, protect them as you do everything else, but at the same time let us say to them, "You are the creatures of the political authority of this country. Your powers were conferred as well for the public good as for your own. We do not mean to let you hold the commerce, the agriculture, the manufactures, the mineral wealth of this country in your sole grasp unrestrained and unregulated by law, but we mean that you shall be controlled by law as all others are controlled by law." And until the American Congress comes up to this high level, until it assumes that corporations are not created to oppress and wrong the people, but they are created for the benefit of the people, you may talk as much as you please here, you may pass as many bills as you please here, you are on the road, by the inevitable law of cause and effect unless you do this, toward making a nation which in a quarter of a century more without reform will be composed of a few thousand millionaires and millions upon millions of degraded men, cringing and cowering slaves of wealth and power.

The question that addresses itself to every American statesman, therefore, is to do everything to preserve the manhood, maintain the rights, and perpetuate the independence of the American citizen and make him feel a just pride in being an American citizen, that his prosperity and his labor are his own, and that no man, no corporation, no power can rob him without suffering the penalties of violated laws.

I should have been glad to have considered many other questions pertaining to this matter, and to have gone over the whole ground with a view to suggesting such amendments as would, while giving that proper protection and fostering care to the agricultural and commercial interests of this country, at the same time place a curb-bit in the mouth of these corporations who have seized practically upon the revenues of the country, and who have been able by an improper use of their vast resources to subsidize the press, fill the lobbies of our legislatures and of Congress, and employ the talent of the ablest lawyers to destroy the rights of the people in the interest of these corporations which the people are not able to control or to manage.

I have no doubt that these are measures that in time will have to be dealt with by a strong hand. I believe that ought to be done now. One of the best modes of preventing a further increase of it will be by some such measure as that suggested by the gentleman from West Virginia. I hope his proposed substitute will be adopted.

I would like also, Mr. Speaker, to have been able to make some criticism upon the substance of the bills themselves which are now pending in this connection, but I have not been able to do so for the reason that other duties have prevented me from giving that attention to their details which would enable me to make a careful review and criticism of them. I do not approve all that is in either of them, but I believe that judicious amendments will make entirely acceptable to the people of the country the bill or proposed substitute offered by the gentleman from West Virginia, which more thoroughly covers the ground.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HERBERT.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has twenty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me to have an amendment read, as I shall not probably be in the Hall when this bill is open for amendments?

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the amendment which I propose.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 3, after the word importance, in line 33, add:

"There shall also be a division of forestry, the chief of which shall ascertain the annual amount of consumption, importation, and exportation of timber and other forest products; the probable supply for future wants; the means best adapted to the preservation and renewal of forests; the influence of forests upon climate, and kindred subjects."

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask to have that regarded as pending.

Mr. KENNA. While this amendment is being offered I desire to ask if it is understood that my substitute is pending to the original bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. This amendment is being simply read for information.

Mr. KENNA. I understand that; but I desire information as to the substitute which I presented, whether that is pending?

Mr. VALENTINE. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. KENNA. I understood that in my necessary absence on yesterday morning the gentleman from Texas offered the substitute which I had prepared, and that it is pending now as the first amendment.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is correct.

The Chair understands the gentleman from Alabama does not desire to occupy the floor.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether amendments would be in order if offered to either of the substitutes; and if the substitutes fail, whether they can then be offered to the original bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that at the proper time they will be in order as amendments to either the substitutes or original bill.

Mr. HERBERT. I yield my time to the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. MONEY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for twenty-five minutes.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, in proceeding to the discussion of this bill and the offices it proposes to create, it seems to me that it will be well for us to examine the laws in relation to the Department of Agriculture and find what we now have. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read as a part of my remarks the portions of the Revised Statutes which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 521. The Department of Agriculture shall be under the charge of a Commissioner of Agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be entitled to a salary of $4,000 a year.

One chief clerk, at a salary of $2,000 a year.
One chemist, at a salary of $2,000 a year.
One assistant chemist, at a salary of $1,600 a year.
One entomologist, at a salary of $2,000 a year.
One microscopist, at a salary of $1,800 a year.

One librarian, at a salary of $1,800 a year.
One engineer, at a salary of $1,400 a year.
One superintendent of the folding-room, at a salary of $1,200 a year.
Two attendants in the museum, at a salary of $1,000 a year each.
One carpenter, at a salary of $960 a year.

SEC. 523. The Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint a chief clerk, with a salary of $2,000 a year, who in all cases during the necessary absence of the Commissioner, or when the office of Commissioner shall become vacant, shall perform the duties of Commissioner, and he shall appoint such other employés as Congress may from time to time provide, with salaries corresponding to the salaries of similar officers in other Departments of the Government; and he shall, as Congress may from time to time provide, employ other persons for such time as their services may be needed, including chemists, botanists, entomologists, and other persons skilled in the natural sciences pertaining to agriculture.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 526. The Commissioner of Agriculture shall procure and preserve all information concerning agriculture which he can obtain by means of books and correspondence, and by practical and scientific experiments, accurate records of which experiments shall be kept in his office, by the collection of statistics, and by any other appropriate means within his power; he shall collect new and valuable seeds and plants; shall test, by cultivation, the value of such of them as may require such tests; shall propagate such as may be worthy of propagation; and shall distribute them among agriculturists.

SEC. 527. The purchase and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another; and the purchase or propagation and distribution of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, before I shall begin my remarks it is proper, and is due to myself, that I should state briefly the position which I occupied in the last House of Representatives in regard to a bill then offered of a similar character to that now pending. That bill had for its object, in the language of its advocates, "the elevation of the Department of Agriculture to the dignity of a Cabinet place." I was unable to see in the bill which was presented from the Committee on Agriculture any enlargement of its powers to secure practical advantages to the farmers of this country, the men who were supposed to be the beneficiaries of the act. I was convinced that the terms of the bill if carried out would not effect the design of its advocates. It was introduced without opportunity for amendment and at a period so late in the session that it was obvious to the members of the House it would be unable to get through the Senate for lack of hearing if for no other reason.

I gave then very briefly some of the reasons which determined my action. I may be permitted to repeat something of what I then said. In alluding to the remark that the act would confer dignity upon the profession of agriculture, I, who had felt the sense of independence and pride in his profession which every true farmer feels, said:

Gentlemen talk about adding dignity to the profession of agriculture! It is insulting to that noble profession to say so! I beg gentlemen's pardon, but there is no power in this Congress to add one jot or tittle to the dignity of the profession which embraces the majority of our population, owning the greater part of our property, the most reliably conservative in peace and patriotic in war—a profession upon whose labors the prosperity of every other class is based, and whose industry, economy, and intelligence furnish the basis of our national prosperity and honor.

No, sir! The farmers of our land stand independent of empty compliments, and are accustomed to confer dignity upon others. If it could be shown that this measure would lift one single burden from the farmer's shoulder, add one single dollar to his purse, soften a single asperity of his rugged toil, brighten his life with one added ray of sunshine, or endow him with a higher conception of the dignity, honor, and usefulness of his profession, it would receive my hearty support. * * * I represent an agricultural constituency. I believe I understand their wants. I know I fully sympathize with them in all their aspirations and efforts for improvement, material and otherwise, and my recorded votes since I have been a member of this House show that I have consulted their interests and provided for them as faithfully as lay within my power, and I will gladly assist in any measure to promote their good.

I knew, moreover, that it did not require an act of Congress to make a Cabinet officer; the President can call into his Cabinet any officer he may choose.

In 1832 Mr. Barry, then Postmaster-General, was invited by President Jackson to attend the sitting of the Cabinet, which invitation was accepted, and the Postmaster-General has been a Cabinet officer from that day. There is not even an official record of this fact, the only record being a paragraph in a weekly paper, the Niles Register, stating substantially what I have just repeated.

Last winter the Legislature of Mississippi memorialized her Senators and Representatives on this question, and requested them to vote for a bill of this character; and although not always governed by requests of the Legislature, I am accustomed to treat them with most respectful consideration, and they are powerfully persuasive on me as the opinions of a large body of highly respectable and intelligent men.

I went among my people last fall and I found that their general sentiment was against my vote and in favor of a measure of this kind. And I am here, Mr. Speaker, as a representative of my constituents. I in part represent a State which is more purely agricultural than any other within this Union; that is, a larger proportion of its people are engaged in agriculture than in any other State or Territory. I found that the farmers had a great desire to see the head of the department which had been created for their interests made a member of the Cabinet. And as their representative, not speaking simply for myself but endeavoring to voice their sentiments and wishes, I desire now to record myself in favor of this measure, believing that in doing so I carry out the honest and sincere desire of the people of the district which sends me here.

It will be seen, Mr. Speaker, from the reading of the statute by the Clerk that the department is not in the enfeebled, useless, and crippled condition represented yesterday by the gentleman in charge of this bill, but equipped with officers and powers capable of vast and beneficent usefulness. He seemed to have looked at this Department of Agriculture through an inverted telescope, everything in it being dwarfed, shrunk, and dwindled in such a way as to be made to appear insignificant and contemptible. Then when he began to consider the disasters that would follow the refusal in the House to consider this bill favorably he turned his telescope, and every one of these evils was so unduly magnified to his vision that he seemed to think ruin and desolation would come upon the country if the bill should not be passed and the honorable Commissioner safely landed in the Cabinet.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to use a telescope in considering this question. I propose to look with the naked eye at this department precisely as it stands to-day. We have seen what authority and power the law has given to this department; and the question is, whether these powers can be so enlarged that the department can be of greater practical benefit and use to the real farmers than now. If that can be done, then by every consideration of public policy the representative is called upon to consider favorably the propositions put forth in this bill and to enlarge this department in the scope of its duties and its powers.

I shall not go into any general review of statistics pertinent to this matter. You have heard recited time and again during the debate on the tariff commission the number of people engaged in agriculture, in mining, in transportation, in commerce, and so on; you have seen all the industries of the country paraded in their matériel as well as their personnel to the view of the House. I shall not tell you of the amount of the products of the country, its cotton, its wheat, its corn, its oats, its bacon, and all the varied products of the farm. I want to get down to the provisions of this bill and to show to the House what benefits will follow if this bill becomes law. I have an amendment to the bill, Mr. Speaker, which I desire at the proper time to offer; and it is an amendment which in my judgment will carry with it in a great measure the benefits that can be anticipated from changing the law on this subject.

I had the honor to introduce a bill which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. I do not know whether it came into the consideration of that committee when they framed this bill or not. It was afterward introduced into the Senate by one of my colleagues in that body, Senator GEORGE, and is now, I understand, on the Calendar of the Senate, approved by the Senate Committee on Agriculture substantially. I bring here just two sections of that bill, which have not been embodied in the bill presented by the committee, or in any of the substitutes proposed.

I endeavored to impress upon this House when it had the subject of the appropriations for this department before it the necessity for a more liberal expenditure of the public money as a profitable investment for this country in the distribution of seeds and the collection of statistics. Thomas Henry Buckle said well that statistics are the anatomy of history. But statistics are only valuable as the result of observation, experiment, and collation in a comprehensive field of labor. You may make one experiment or observation, and it will not be of the slightest value to science. You make two experiments and they are of very little value. You make a hundred, and their general average begins to give you an idea of the truth. You make a thousand experiments, and then you have a general average that approximates to the truth. And if you can sufficiently increase the number of your experiments or observations you can get at almost the exact truth as to facts, and reach a well-defined rule in principles which will govern in almost every case.

That is a proposition which I believe will not be controverted. In my mind the collection of statistics by this department, their diffusion among the people for application to practical business is the most valuable use of which it is capable. The collection of the crop statistics of all parts of the Union and their prompt and thorough dissemination will confer a benefit so vast, if properly utilized, that it would be impossible for me to overestimate it. Now, we have had a Bureau of Statistics, but the appropriations for that bureau have been so insignificant that it has been impossible to more than partially utilize it. I will say, further, that I believe we have had until now the essential lack at the head of that department of a great organizing and administrative mind. At any rate the small machinery which has been used by that department for the collection of statistics and the meager appropriations by Congress to set that machinery in motion have given results entirely beneath the demands and expectation of the country and of comparatively trifling value.

The Southern States produced last year about two hundred and fifty million dollars' worth of cotton, yet the Department of Agriculture has one reporter in each county of the cotton-growing region, while Bradstreet's Commercial Agency has three. It was about the 10th of December before the cotton-growers knew what the cotton crop of last year was. It was about the 10th of December before we had anything like definite information that there was a shortage of about one million of bales.

I say there is not to-day a member of the Committee on Agriculture, nor a member of this House, and I might perhaps say not a man in the United States who can come within 30,000,000 bushels of the present supply of wheat. There is no difficulty in so enlarging your field of observation, so multiplying your stations and observers that the department could publish week by week a body of statistics that would perfectly apprise the people of this country and of every other country of the condition of our crops, and approximate within a very immaterial margin of the real amount of the season's crop. We got the news on the 10th of December that the cotton crop was 1,000,000 bales short. There is no reason why the Agricultural Department should not have told this country by the 1st of October within 100,000 bales of that crop. By the 1st of October the crop has gone out of the hands of the producer, of the farmer, of the laborer, who has wrought the soil of the earth into this snowy harvest. The producer has absolutely parted with the possession of his crop to the middleman, who has shipped it or is about to ship it to his merchant in New Orleans or New York, or wherever he may be, and the information comes all too late to be valuable to them.

The man who has worked through the varying seasons of the year to produce the crop is not the beneficiary of the increase of price caused by this shortage of 1,000,000 bales. Who is the beneficiary? The speculator, the gambler in "futures" and "corners." The speculators get the news of the true condition of the crop, and the consequence is that there is a corner in cotton or grain, and the farmer gets a poor subsistence, and the speculator gets the profits. They have their agents throughout the West, the Northwest, and the South; they obtain full information in regard to the crop, and then there is a "corner," in which the producer has no stock, which builds up sudden fortunes for a few who toil not, at the expense of the many who eat their daily bread in the sweat of their brows.

I am told that corn is selling to-day at a higher price than at any time before for twenty years. Does the farmer get the benefit of that high price? His crop has long since gone to the market; his opportunity has gone, and long before the corners in grain at Chicago and New York and New Orleans have enriched the gambler, the farmer is preparing for another year of toil and disappointment.

This is an evil that should be cured; it is an evil that can be cured. It only needs that this Congress should wake up to a proper appreciation of the fact, that they have only to set in motion the appliances which they already possess by providing for such an expenditure of money as will keep an army of reporters in the field so that this information may be obtained in a thorough and exhaustive manner and then published every week or every day, complete or incomplete. Whatever the secretary has in his office should be sent to the people and made as free as the air they breathe. This information, worth so many millions of dollars, should not be the peculiar property of speculators and sharpers.

Is there anything impossible about this? By such a method the profits on every rise of grain, cotton, and other crops would, in part at least, go into the pockets of the men who labor to produce them.

We have a Signal Bureau in this city which sends its weather reports out every day to any man in the Union who will ask for them. We have appropriated about $2,000,000 a year that they may be plentifully distributed into every quarter. Does any man feel disposed to quarrel with the Government for appropriating $2,000,000 a year for so beneficent a work? Because of the information so received of coming storms the farmer is enabled to gather in his hay and his grain; fleets remain in port with furled sails in safety, whose broken fragments would otherwise strew our shores. Millions of dollars and thousand of lives are saved every year by the operation of that bureau. They send out their messengers of warning and advice each day.

Now, with one-half, one-fourth, yes, with one-eighth of that expenditure of $2,000,000 a year, the department of Agriculture could send such information of the condition and prospects of the crops broadcast throughout this land as would leave much of these thousands and millions of dollars of profit now exclusively enjoyed by speculators in the hands of the producers themselves.

We have a Bureau of Statistics; we have the machinery there, but we have never yet had the proper management of it, nor have we had a Congress liberal enough to appropriate the money to develop its full capacity for usefulness.

Mr. Speaker, the field of usefulness in this particular cannot be overstated. We can so organize this department as to put it at work and make it of incalculable benefit to the people of the country. We have a Health Bureau, recently organized, which once every week sends its reports broadcast throughout the land at great expense. Does anybody say that this money is not profitably expended? Why, sir, even in a mere business relation it is well to know the sanitary condition of the people; it is well to know at what points small-pox, yellow-fever, or other contagious diseases prevail, so that everybody may take notice of the facts and commerce may be regulated accordingly.

I notice in every one of the bills, substitutes, or amendments now before the House ample preparation for the gathering of statistics. Each of these measures that I have before me provides for separate bureaus. The main value of these several bureaus is for gathering statistics. But what commensurate machinery has the committee embraced in the bill reported, to disseminate among the people the information thus gathered? Do they want to get information and bury it in the Agricultural Department? Do they want to get these statistics and put them in an agricultural report that comes out two or three years after its date? Why, sir, we shall not do any good in that way; and if this is to be the result the money expended will be thrown away. I have here an amendment which, as I have said, I will offer at the proper time, and which I now read to the House for its information. It proposes to provide machinery for diffusing the information which is to be collected at such cost by the various appliances of the department. I propose to insert as an amendment this language:

That the secretary shall publish for the general diffusion of the information collected as above directed by the several bureaus of the department, his report at least once a week; and he is hereby authorized and empowered to adopt such other methods of diffusing valuable information among the industrial classes as his judgment may approve; and he shall exchange his reports, bulletins, and other publications with the weekly journals of this Union for copies of their several publications, which shall be filed in the library of the Department of Agriculture.

This method of acquainting the masses with the knowledge so widely gathered is inexpensive, comprehensive, and thorough. Every farmer and workingman takes or ought to take his county paper; he reads generally everything in it and is disposed to rely upon and accept its news. No man knows better than myself the value and power and usefulness of the county press. These weekly papers, receiving these reports of crop statistics from the department, select those affecting the peculiar crops of the locality and week by week give the farmer practically accurate information of the average condition and prospects of the crops, accompanied by estimates of total yield and probable price as will secure him the average market price for his product and the proper and just reward for his toil.

Mr. Speaker, the other amendment which I shall offer provides that "the secretary of the Department of Agriculture shall establish experimental stations for the purpose of practically testing soils, fertilizers, machinery, plants, trees, seeds, &c., with reference to climate, in each State and Territory, one of which experimental stations in each State shall be attached to an agricultural college, if there be one."

This would not cost a great deal, for almost every State I believe has an agricultural college, and these would be glad to have the stations proposed attached and would furnish without cost offices, implements, grounds, telegraphic appliances, &c. The actual value of these stations as compared with the present method I think too obvious for discussion. Through the agencies of this department the work of our farmers' wives and children should be varied and lightened by introducing and teaching such occupations as silk culture, &c., requiring less physical labor and more thought and reading. It is worth great effort and money to induce and encourage the adornment of rural homes, surrounding the useful and necessary with the beautiful and ornamental. It would cheer and brighten the lives made dull by the monotony of daily toil.

The workingmen in the factories living in populous cities and towns have all the advantages of association in organized intellectual bodies such as libraries, lyceums, &c., and also of social and religious assemblies. This facility of congregation vastly softens toil and lightens the daily burden. The farmer toils lonely in his field and rarely meets for social, religious, or mental improvement with his neighbors. We want that the farmer's wife and daughter should do something better than drudgery. We want some occupation that will give time for and lead their minds to think. All the influences of home are increased as its attractions are heightened, and by the mere process of assimilation the young children grow beautiful according to their surrounding. Nature believes in harmonies, and the child surrounded by flowers and pictures will somehow in the subtle processes of its growth catch beauty of form and expression from everything that impresses its senses. Every new comfort in the humble cottage, every fresh adornment, each added grace of line or color, brings new pleasure and greater rest and comfort, and these bring new strength, increased capacity of brain, better impulses, higher aspirations, nobler endeavor, more honorable achievement, and the result is the great sum of human happiness is augmented.

The farmers do more for the Government and have less done for them than any other class. They feed the country in peace and fight for it in war; they hold with equal steadiness the plowshare in the furrow of the quiet field, and their country's flag on the fiery crest of battle. They are less easily corrupted than the devotees of trade, and they have always been the last stronghold of virtue, the steadfast hope of patriotism. These farmers have patiently borne the burden of a most grievous taxation for the benefit of others. Silent under exaction, plundered by law, they have not used their giant strength to right their wrongs. They rarely indulge even in the luxury of complaint. They believe that something should be done for them. Relief from a too grinding tariff is one thing, and they want an executive department to look after their interests. It must be apparent to every one that a properly organized department, with its powers extended to embrace the matters contemplated, must work a great good which will be practically felt in country homes all over our land. As this noble industry, which made civilization possible, is to-day the sure foundation of all our prosperity, can we do a more proper, a more profitable work than to enlarge its capacity, utilize all its varied powers, and rejoice its laborers? All the mines of gold and silver may be exhausted, our manufactories may be stilled by the changing circumstances of commerce, but as long as the sunlight, the dew, and the rain shall bless the earth, so long shall the farmer's calling be the sure and unfailing source of comforts and blessings, of national glory, strength, and permanence.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, obtained the floor and said: I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HUBBELL.]

Mr. HUBBELL. Mr. Speaker, under the direction of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, I have reported to this House a substitute for the bill now under consideration, that substitute having been printed as House bill No. 4429. I desire, before proceeding with my remarks, to modify the substitute in one or two particulars. In the first place, I wish to add, after line 11 of section 2, the following:

And in addition to the powers and duties now devolved by law on said department there shall be added the powers and duties hereinafter provided for.

I desire also to recast section 5 of the substitute, so that it shall read as follows:

That the commission known as the Geological Survey is hereby transferred from the Department of the Interior to the said department of agriculture; and it shall be the duty of the Geological Survey to collect statistics relating to mining industries, and to make investigations relating to the utilization of the waste products of mining industries; and the operations of the Geological Survey shall be extended over all portions of the United States; and the director of the Geological Survey shall have power to appoint, under the direction of the secretary of agriculture, such geologists, geographers, chemists, mining engineers, and other scientific experts as may be necessary for the prosecution of the survey, as appropriations are made by law therefor.

Mr. Speaker, I have assumed it to be the sense of the House that there should be some changes made in the Department of Agriculture; that this department ought to be raised to the full dignity of an Executive Department of the Government, with a secretary at its head. In what I may say I do not wish to be understood as antagonizing in any way that proposition. But I must be permitted to say that I think the bill now under consideration, if it does this at all, does it in such a bungling way as, if adopted, will prove disastrous to the department. The first section of the substitute reported by me from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service (and I wish the attention of the House, that the difference between these two bills may be understood) simply takes the Department of Agriculture as now established and creates it into a department of the Government with a secretary, who shall be a Cabinet officer; and by express words it so amends section 158 of the Revised Statutes as to bring this department clearly within the scope of that section. This substitute provides that section 158 "shall be amended to include said department by adding at the end thereof the words: 'Eighth. The department of agriculture, which shall hereafter be the title of said department.'"

By reference to the Revised Statutes gentlemen will not fail to observe that the title here proposed corresponds with the titles there given to other departments of the Government. In other words, section 1 of the substitute is definite in its character, while section 1 of the bill of the Committee on Agriculture is indefinite, as a reference to the bill will I think convince the House.

Now, let us take section 2 of the proposed substitute. What does it do? It authorizes the President to appoint the secretary and the assistant secretary and fixes their compensation. It takes the Department of Agriculture as it now stands, preserves it intact with all its powers and duties, adding thereto by subsequent provisions of the bill certain duties. On the other hand section 2 of the bill of the Commissioner on Agriculture, now under consideration, authorizes the appointment of an assistant who shall be a practical agriculturist.

It does another thing. It provides that certain bureau officers hereinafter to be created under this act shall be appointed by the President and shall hold their office for a term of four years. Now, in nearly all the Departments of the Government the bureau or division officers are appointed by the Secretaries of those Departments.

And just here, let me state that the bill as introduced makes no provision at all for the appointment of a chief clerk of this department. It limits the appointment of assistant secretary to a man who shall be—what? Why, sir, it limits the appointment to a man who shall be a practical agriculturist. There is one practical agriculturist put into this bill. It limits the appointment to a specific class of persons. In this regard the bill seems to doubt whether in meeting the wants of the Department of Agriculture the President will in his wise discretion appoint suitable persons to act as secretary and assistant secretary. It seems to doubt whether the President will do what this House now seems so willing to recognize ought to be done, and that is that this agriculture department should be elevated and enlarged in its scope, and that great industry recognized in a suitable manner.

It will be observed that the value of the proposed substitute consists in this, that the existing bureaus or divisions in the Agricultural Department are all preserved. These bureaus or divisions are at present well organized and only require sufficient appropriations by Congress to be perfected in all their work and usefulness. Let us inquire what are these bureaus as they now exist? I am afraid the committee which reported this bill did not make that inquiry. What are these bureaus as they now exist in the Agricultural Department?

First, there is a Bureau of Statistics, the appropriation for which Congress has just increased from $10,000 to $80,000. It is a bureau which has already furnished valuable statistical information, and which, with the increased appropriation, will no doubt be able to secure for every State in this Union the most accurate information with regard to the products and markets in this country, and, what is of great value to the farmer here, accurate information of the crops and markets in Europe.

Let me illustrate the value of this to the farmer. A large portion of the wheat crop of Ohio last year was sold at prices far below its actual value from the want of knowledge of the condition of the market and crops in Europe. The loss from this cause was very great to the farmer, and to-day, sir, statisticians are urging the Department of Agriculture to furnish this information, saying that it is of the utmost value that the farmers of the country should have the information in time as to the foreign markets.

There is a bureau now cheaply organized for this purpose, with a man at the head of it who receives only $2,000 a year, and who to-day is furnishing the precise information required by the farmers of this country, not only as to the markets here, but as to the foreign markets. The gentleman says that is in this bill. Now, my friend will not fail to observe that this is already a bureau or division in the Department of Agriculture, and therefore I ask, why should it be provided for under an omnibus clause in the pending bill, which, if adopted, will utterly take away from the Commissioner of Agriculture the work of this bureau and place it under the charge and power of another man, who is to be a practical agriculturist?

We have, again, the bureau or division of chemistry now in the Department of Agriculture, and which is engaged in supplying information with regard to the value of fertilizers and ores, with regard to the chemical quality of soils, the value of various articles of food for man and animals, the chemical value and capacity of many important crops, &c., and which of itself, if properly endowed by Congress, can be made a very important and valuable bureau.

I wish especially to call the attention of the House to the departures from the present organization of the Agricultural Department which are proposed to be instituted by the pending proposition. There is now in the Department of Agriculture a bureau of entomology, which is engaged in work of the utmost importance to the producers of the great staple crops of the country, and it is even now constantly appealed to from every section of the country to provide remedies against the destructive insects whose ravages are a source of such infinite loss to the farmer and producer. We now have that bureau in the Agricultural Department, already organized, running upon the cheapest method possible.

We also have in the department, as at present organized, the bureau or division of forestry, just now in its infancy, but engaged in solving one of the most important industrial problems in our country, namely, the production and preservation and economical use of the vast mass of timber growing in every variety throughout our country.

The gentleman says this is in his bill. It is already organized under the Department of Agriculture, and therefore why should it be included as a bureau under the pending bill. The Commissioner of Agriculture now superintends it; but when we provide for a secretary of agriculture, this bill would have an intervening bureau officer for this purpose at a salary of $3,000. We also have in the Bureau of Agriculture, as at present organized, the division of botany, the business of which is not only to classify the grasses and economic plants of the country, but to suggest the methods by which new and appropriate grasses and plants can be introduced into the various sections of the country.

We also have a bureau or division for the collection and distribution of new and valuable seeds throughout the country. We have a great seed bureau now provided in the Agricultural Department. In this pending bill a separate bureau is to be organized for this purpose. I do not take so much stock in the distribution of seeds as some agriculturists do. Here, then, are what we now have in the Agricultural Department, as it is at present organized, working economically and cheaply.

But what does this committee propose in addition to all this? Now, in addition to this the substitute bill imposes other and important duties on the Department of Agriculture. In the first place it provides that the bureau or division of statistics shall collect all information relating to manufactures and labor.

And it goes further, if gentlemen will examine the bill and see the next section. Instead of increasing the divisions of the department it authorizes the secretary to call upon the Bureau of Statistics for all information relating to the internal commerce of the country which the gentleman from Texas was so anxious about a few minutes ago. Let us see what that information is which the organized bureau of the Government is directed to collate and collect. Chapter 129, paragraph 3, of the supplement to the Revised Statutes provides that—

> It shall be the duty of the officer in charge of the Bureau of Statistics to gather, collate, and annually report to the Secretary of the Treasury, for transmission to Congress, statistics, and facts relating to commerce with foreign nations and among the several States; the railroad systems of this and other countries; the construction and operation of railroads; the actual cost of such construction and operation of railroads; the actual cost of transporting freights and passengers on railroads, and on canals, rivers, and other navigable waters of the United States; the charges imposed for such transportation of freight and passengers, and the tonnage transported; and the reports now by law required to be prepared and published monthly in the said Bureau of Statistics shall hereafter be prepared and published quarterly, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, there is the machinery provided by law to gather and collate all of the facts in reference to the commerce of the country which the gentleman claims the farmers ought to have joined with this other great industry of agriculture.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HUBBELL.]

Mr. HUBBELL. Now, the Bureau of Statistics, already organized, is charged with this duty, and provision is made that the chief of that bureau shall collate this information and furnish it as required by the existing law. I wish to note some other objections to the bill of the committee, but my time is so limited that I shall have to hurry over them. I wish some gentleman would yield me five minutes more.

Mr. RICH. I think I am entitled to thirty minutes of my time. If so, I will yield the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. VALENTINE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry right here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VALENTINE. There are several gentlemen who spoke on yesterday and reserved a portion of their time. Afterward the House determined to close the general debate at two o'clock to-day. Now, I desire to know if these gentlemen are to be allowed to farm out the time in this manner to the exclusion of gentlemen on the committee who desire to have an opportunity of speaking on their bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That subject is not now properly before the House. The gentleman from Kansas has yielded five minutes of the fifteen minutes of his time remaining to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HUBBELL. I have said that I desired to note some of the objections to the bill of the committee. In the first place, it does not provide for the appointment of a chief clerk; nor does it fix his salary. In the second place, that the bureaus provided for in it are in many cases entirely unnecessary, as the duties which are specially assigned to them by its provisions are in many cases already performed by the Department as now organized by law. Now, to illustrate this position, let us look for a moment at the bill which the committee proposes. In the first place, it assigns to the bureau of agricultural products all of the powers and duties which are conferred either by express words or by implication, and now devolved by law, upon the Commissioner of Agriculture. This is all transferred by the committee's bill to the bureau of agricultural products and are required to be discharged by that bureau; duties which, as I have said, are already discharged either in person by the Commissioner or through some bureau already organized.

If any gentleman will take time to read the section which enumerates the duties which are to be performed by the head of this bureau and which are already performed by other bureaus as already organized, he will see how true this is. It provides, in the first instance, that the head of the bureau shall be a practical agriculturist; and the duty is imposed upon him of investigating the question of fertilizers, implements, seeds, buildings, and it gives him botany, chemistry, and entomology, with many other duties which are now performed by other bureaus.

The third subdivision of section 3 puts into the hands of the chief of that bureau—bureau of lands—duties that now belong to other divisions, such as timber, which belongs to forestry division; stock-raising, which belongs to the bureau of animal industry; manufacturing, which belongs to the statistical and mining, which should be grouped with the geological survey as an independent bureau and be placed under the supervision of the director of that survey.

The duties of the bureau of agricultural products and of bureau of lands would clash when you came to the practical administration of each. Besides many of the things provided for are utterly impracticable and could not be brought into harmonious or successful operation. If there is anything we need information about it is the question of our mining industries.

Young men of activity and enterprise want to know where there is a chance for mining; and my idea was to transfer to the department the question of our mining interests so that a bureau of mining industry would be created which does not increase the expense, and where the information to be derived will be greater.

section 3. It is already established and organized in the department as it now exists, and if other duties ought to be performed by it they can easily be devolved upon it. If duties relating to education, &c., are to be performed by the Department of Agriculture, the Bureau of Education should be transferred from the Interior Department and its powers so enlarged as to meet what is provided for in the fourth division of section 3. The cost of transportation sought to be obtained under this subdivision is already provided for by law, as will be seen by examining page 129 of the Supplement to the Revised Statutes.

Again, the manufacturing provisions of paragraph 4, section 3, are already included in paragraph 3 of said section 3.

There are many general objections to the bill of the committee. In the first place, it is complicated and extravagant, and so unwieldy that the department could not be organized and run in the building now in use for that purpose. It adds four bureaus to the department, with salaries of their several heads amounting to $3,000 each, which increase the expenditures $23,000, while the substitute offered by myself increases it only $14,500. [Here the hammer fell.] I only want two minutes more.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HUBBELL. The substitute adds but one bureau, that of animal industry, which is already in operation in a certain form in the department, and is now employed in investigating the diseases of animals, for which special appropriations have been made by Congress from time to time.

The Director of the Geological Survey has his salary already fixed by law, and all we do is to devolve upon him certain additional and appropriate duties.

The bill devolves all the substantial powers and duties of the secretary of the department on certain bureau officers. I wish to call attention to this particularly. I say the committee's bill devolves all the powers and duties which are now to be performed or can be performed in that department on certain bureau officers therein named, who are to be appointed by the President; and all the secretary has to do, and all the assistant secretary has to do, is to sit there as figure-heads and draw their salaries. It devolves these duties upon the heads of bureaus. It makes them appointable by the President, to hold office for four years, and sets up a secretary of agriculture, as I have said, as a mere figure-head, to be laughed at over the country.

It seems to me if we are to reorganize this department we ought to do it in a practical, inexpensive way, and add to it just such things as are necessary for the information of the people. I cannot say the bill proposed by me does just that; but it does it, in my humble judgment, to a far greater extent than the bill of the Committee on Agriculture does.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

At the conclusion of the remarks of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, he yielded five minutes of his time to Mr. BLACKBURN.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In the last Congress, when the Committee on Agriculture reported a bill proposing to make a Cabinet office for the then representative of that great interest, I opposed it. I did so for two reasons. In the first place, the bill submitted did not meet the demands of the agricultural interest. In the second place, I am frank to say that up to that time there had been no man presiding over the Department of Agriculture who had impressed me with his fitness for those duties or that service. Both those objections are removed in this case. The Committee on Agriculture have reported a bill to this House which in my judgment meets the demand of the agricultural interest and which makes suitable provision for them. And that Department is presided over to-day by a man who stands confessedly fit for the service to which he is assigned, who brings to his present position the same admitted accomplishments and broad cultivation and honesty of purpose that marked his course when serving with us as a member of this House. This service has been elevated, and the proposition which comes to us from the Committee on Agriculture in my judgment tends still further to elevate and to protect this great interest.

I am not desirous of entering the lists for the championship of the agricultural people of this land, but I am extremely desirous of seeing that interest at least receive some recognition at the hands of this Government. From the very nature of the farmer's avocation the agriculturists of the country are more widely scattered and their opportunities for interchange of views or for dissemination of information are less by all odds than belong to any other class of our industrial population.

I find that the bill presented by the committee proposes to create a department of agriculture to consist of four bureaus: the first to be termed the bureau of agricultural products; the second to be termed the bureau of animal industry, which reaches and covers all the stock-rearing interests of this country; the third is the bureau of lands; the fourth and last is the bureau of statistics, for the dissemination as well as the collection of all information that may be of service to the growers of cereals, to the cotton-planter and stock-rearer of the country. We find, then, that every agricultural interest of this country is comprehended and embraced in the provisions of this bill.

I believe that it ought to be passed. I will not undertake to say that there have not been offered or submitted amendments which, if adopted, would tend to its improvement. I do not undertake to deny that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] might make it still more valuable by multiplying the publications of reports through this bureau of statistics, by bringing the farmer in every section of the country into closer proximity with this fountain-head of information.

I do not believe that the amendment by way of substitute offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] will increase the benefits of the measure now pending. I do not believe that the incorporation of the commercial interests of this country into this agricultural bureau will carry out the purpose of its framers or meet the views of its friends. I do not believe that it is the part of wisdom to bring the consolidated power of the transportation of this country, its great railroad corporations, under the same mantle and the shield which you propose to put over the farmer of the land. If you do, I believe those corporations will capture and control it, and, instead of becoming a means of relief to the farmer, it will be converted through railroad companies' combinations into an engine of additional oppression.

I am opposed to the substitute offered by the gentleman from West Virginia. I want the bill from the Committee on Agriculture as it is, unless it be passed with some immaterial amendments, which will simply tend to make it more efficient in carrying out its original design and purpose. For that reason I simply desire to express my approbation of this measure, and my readiness to support it substantially as it is, and my confidence in the good results that will follow from its enactment.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I will reserve what time I have remaining.

Mr. KENNA. On yesterday I reserved twenty-five minutes of the time I was entitled to occupy. I would like to take it now if I can be recognized. I desire to remind the Chair in this connection that those who favor the original bill have occupied much the largest portion of the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman now.

Mr. KENNA. I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES.]

Mr. SCALES and Mr. HOGE addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. KENNA. How much time is remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Five minutes of the gentleman's time remain.

Mr. KENNA. In the five minutes remaining I desire to say a word or two in regard to the position assumed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] with reference to the influence which he predicts is to be exerted over the agricultural interests of the country by the connection of the agricultural and the commercial interests under one management. I desire to remind that gentleman and the House that the powers of the existing Treasury Department which bear relation in any shape to the financial negotiations and the financial relationship between the Government of the United States and the railroads constructed by its aid will by this proposed substitute in no wise be interfered with.

In so far as the Treasury Department now embraces under its management divisions and subdivisions with regard to commerce, both internal and external, it is, and I submit it to the House and to all the members present, a measure which embraces every one of these divisions and subdivisions. I believe and maintain a position entirely opposite to the prediction which my friend from Kentucky has seen fit to assume; and I believe that to-day if the supervision of the commercial interests of this country and the supervision of the agricultural interests of the country in so far as the Government has assumed to exercise control or jurisdiction over either or both—that if they shall be included under the same management it would result in relief to the country to a large degree, from the fact that its commercial and transportation regulations have heretofore had no reference whatever to the agricultural interests.

I believe rather with the gentleman from Texas, who takes the position that the collecting and collating of matters of interest pertaining to these two divisions under one general management will exercise a restraining influence over either in so far as there may be a tendency to trespass upon the prerogatives of the other. I have no apprehension of possible danger resulting from such a combination, as the gentleman from Kentucky seems to have. On the other hand, I believe that the mere naked enlargement of the Agricultural Department and its elevation to the dignity of a Cabinet position, with a Cabinet head, will, as I have stated before, on yesterday, be simply the enlargement of a shadow without the corresponding enlargement of the substance. I believe that the combination of the two will have a tendency to correct any inequalities which may exist in either with reference to their relations to each other.

So far as bringing under one general management the commerce and the navigation interests of the country, I believe that it will result in bringing to the farming class of the country a relief from burdens which they have never been able heretofore by any measure to secure, by cheapening the transportation of their products and enlightening them with reference to the various methods and processes through which their various products are subjected during the process of shipment.

I believe that the future dealings with the commercial needs of the country under this system will do more in the interest of agriculture than the bare advantage which agriculture may possibly receive from the enactment of such a bill as that which the committee have presented.

I had hoped, sir, that there would have been practical unanimity in the House as to the manifest propriety of embracing both of these divisions under one management. I had trusted and believed that such would have been the case, and I now believe, from the views which have been expressed by members on both sides of the House, that the substitute will finally be adopted; in which event I feel assured that the substitute, embracing as it does both of these provisions under one head, will be favorably received elsewhere for consideration. Its adoption will result in the end in giving all the benefit that our legislation here can give to agriculture, as well as to commerce; and by its adoption we place ourselves in an attitude similar to other great agricultural nations with reference to the proper development of this paramount interest in our country.

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, I had expected to address the House during the consideration of this bill touching the agricultural resources and needs of the country at considerable length, comparing them with the agricultural needs and resources of other countries. But as the gentlemen who have preceded me have so carefully, eloquently, and ably presented all of these points to the House, it will be unnecessary to make any extended remarks upon the question.

I will therefore attempt to confine myself in the time accorded me to calling attention to the provisions of the bill reported from the Committee on Agriculture, and compare them with the various substitutes offered by gentlemen to this bill.

I hope that the members present have examined carefully the bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture, as it is published in the RECORD of this morning. When this question was called up yesterday for consideration it was ascertained that all of the bills of the committee were exhausted, that the supply had given out, and it was almost impossible to procure a single copy; but it was also found that there was a generous supply of the substitutes, which were scattered about the House and a copy of each laid upon the desk of almost every member. I think, therefore, in the first place, that as between agriculture and commerce, commerce had the start, as they desire it to have in the race they are trying to make now.

It has been the intention and the object of the Committee on Agriculture to elevate—to raise up—to widen and extend the powers and duties of the Agricultural Department of this Government. They have given this question considerable care and attention; and if it is true as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] has said that the bill they have brought into the House and upon which they ask your vote is so bungling that it ought not to receive your support, if that statement be true, then it is your duty as wise legislators to reject it, refer it back to the committee, or give the subject to some other committee more competent than this has shown itself in this matter.

The gentleman from Michigan, it seems, early in the session had some misgivings as to the capacity or capability of the Committee on Agriculture to properly draft and bring before Congress a measure of this kind; because the gentleman himself introduced a resolution some time ago directing the Committee on Civil Service Reform to examine into that subject and report a bill to the House. No objection was made. We heard his resolution read, and were anxious that that committee also might have jurisdiction of this matter—a very important one indeed to the House and the country. We have waited anxiously all these weeks and months to ascertain what the wisdom of that committee would furnish the House on that subject; and we now have the report of that committee which the gentleman from Michigan offers as a substitute for our bill.

That a department of agriculture should be an executive department I think is fairly conceded by nearly every member of this House. The agriculturists of this country feel, and I think justly so, that they have been neglected while other interests have been constantly fostered by this Government. The Government has spent millions upon millions of dollars and has given millions of acres of land subsidizing corporations to build railroads throughout this country. What has it done for the benefit of agriculture? The agriculturists have for several years been asking a more definite recognition on the part of the Government of their valuable interests; and the committee in charge of this question have reported a bill which is simply agricultural in its parts. They make a secretary of agriculture, one assistant secretary of agriculture, and four bureaus in that department, covering I think all the interests that are necessary to a fair, honest, active understanding of the agricultural needs of this country.

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] offers as a substitute all that is reported by the Committee on Agriculture, but adds a division, as he terms it, called a division of commerce. He has changed the name from a secretary of agriculture to that of a secretary of industries, making a division of agriculture and a division of commerce. To this our committee seriously object. It has been the object and desire of the committee, and in accordance with the express wish of every agricultural society of any kind, name, or shape that has addressed itself to this body on the subject, to eliminate everything else from this bill except agriculture.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] supports the amendment or the substitute of the gentleman from West Virginia. He calls agriculture and commerce, as does the gentleman from West Virginia, twin sisters. But he soon leaves the subject of agriculture, branches off into anti-monopoly, and is down on the railroad companies; for part of his time he abuses the banks, and finally winds up by asking you gentlemen here to take the agricultural interests of this land and place them in the hands of the monopolies. For that is just what I believe would be the result if this House to-day or this Congress, at this or any other session, should pass the bill introduced by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The gentleman from Texas says he likes bold men, chivalrous men, men who have the courage to grapple with the lion—monopoly; and yet he stands on this floor and asks you gentlemen to place internal commerce as a division alongside of agriculture. Why, when, where, and how at any time have the agriculturists of this country come before this Congress or any other and by a lobby, or raising large sums of money, asked legislation in their behalf? And yet these gentlemen who stand here and cry "down with the railroads," say "take the railroad interest of this country and place it alongside of agriculture as a division under a department of industries." Why, Mr. Speaker, how long do you suppose the agricultural lamb would exist placed alongside of the railroad lion? If they are set side by side in one department in this Government, is there a man here who does not honestly believe that inside of two years the commerce lion would eat up, wool and all, the agricultural lamb?

Mr. KENNA. If it would not interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. VALENTINE. Not at all.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to ask the gentleman to point out, if he can, the provision, or section, or clause, or the words in the proposed substitute that embraces railroads. There is not one solitary item in it that embraces that subject in any manner whatever.

Mr. VALENTINE. Then, Mr. Speaker, if it is only the intention or object of the gentleman, by offering his substitute, to include that species of commerce which is external, as he terms it, in one portion of his bill, and which is wholly without the limits of the United States, then I say it has no business to be in the Agricultural Department, and ought not to be there.

Mr. KENNA. Will the gentleman pardon me one moment? The substitute embraces the transfer from the Treasury Department of everything relating to commerce and navigation. But railroads are not carried with it. They remain where they are. If this Congress should pass a law regulating railroads, it can send the administration of that law where it pleases. The substitute, as it now stands, does not justify the assumption of the gentleman from Nebraska, that it brings the railroads and the Department of Agriculture together, either in association or antagonism.

Mr. VALENTINE. Your substitute brings John Roach in, does it not?

Mr. KENNA. I trust in God it does not.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think it does.

As a member and the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, I desire to say that it is the unanimous wish of that committee, after a careful study of the proposed substitute and of all the bills introduced and referred to them, that this House stand by them in support of their original bill as amended by the gentleman in charge of the measure.

Now, if this department be elevated to an Executive Department, after it has got well upon its feet, after the country has become acquainted with its workings, if it is then desirable to place internal commerce and interstate commerce in charge of a bureau of that department, it perhaps might be safe to do so. But to take this lamb and this lion and start them out together would, I think, result disastrously to the very interest which this House is now seeking to foster, protect, and elevate.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] criticised severely the bill of the committee; he said it was bunglingly drawn in many of its provisions. He said that the first section of the bill included all the powers now given to the Commissioner of Agriculture; that every power under the present law given to the Commissioner of Agriculture was given to the first bureau designated by the bill of the committee.

Immediately thereafter, referring to the paragraph relating to the third bureau of the committee's bill, the one comprehending lands and forestry, the gentleman showed at once to my mind, and I think to the mind of every other gentleman who followed his remarks, that he simply did not understand the subject he was addressing the House upon; that he did not understand the bill he was talking about. It certainly would be impossible to give in one section every power now existing, and then have three other sections dividing up those powers.

Mr. HUBBELL. I said nearly every power.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think I have quoted the gentleman correctly; I took down his words at the time. One of the most important sections of this bill is the section providing for a bureau of statistics.

I listened with much pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] upon that subject, and I think I can indorse all that he said upon it.

It is the desire of the present Committee on Agriculture, as shown by their report upon the bill making appropriations for the support of the Agricultural Department, to enlarge the powers of that bureau of the Department. Heretofore only about five or ten thousand dollars a year have been appropriated by Congress to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to obtain agricultural statistics. The present committee reported to this House an appropriation of $80,000 for that purpose for the next fiscal year; and that appropriation has passed both the House and the Senate, and has been agreed upon by the committee of conference. Heretofore the agriculturists of this land have had no help from these statistical reports. When I say "no help," I may not be supposed to mean just what I say. We have had, it is true, a report coming from the Agricultural Department two or three years after the information was gathered. But we have had no help from the Government to give to the farmers a knowledge of the present status of their crops.

Grain speculators, grain gamblers, have held the agriculturist in their grip for years. They spend thousands upon thousands of dollars to send agents throughout the entire agricultural regions of the country. If they desire to work upon wheat they send their agents into the wheat regions; if upon cotton, they send their agents into cotton regions, and they know by the time the crop is gathered, if not before, what the crop is.

Mr. HUBBELL. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact. In the bill reported by him there is a provision made for a bureau of animal industry, to be in charge of a competent veterinary surgeon, who shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, &c. The third division is the bureau of lands, the chief of which is charged among other things with reports upon stock-raising, &c. Now, the veterinary surgeon reports upon stock, their diseases, &c., and the third bureau is to report upon stock-raising.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman misunderstands those two sections.

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask the gentleman to explain them.

Mr. VALENTINE. I will do so. The gentleman misunderstands those two sections to the same extent that he misunderstands the entire bill. I think his judgment of those sections is a fair sample of his judgment of our bill.

The second provision is for a bureau of animal industry, to be in charge of a competent veterinary surgeon, who shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection, growth, and use; the causes, prevention, and cure of contagious, communicable or other diseases; and the kinds, races, or breeds best adapted to the several sections for profitable raising.

The third provides for a bureau of lands, and the duty of the chief of that bureau is to report upon the resources or capabilities of the public or other lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, or other industrial uses. The one reports on the number and kind of animals in the United States, as to the diseases that are communicable and contagious and the best methods for eradicating and driving away such diseases. The other reports wholly upon the adaptability of the soil of the country, as to whether certain portions of the public lands are better adapted to wheat, cotton, or stock-raising, and if to stock-raising what kind of stock shall it be—cattle, sheep, or swine. That is his duty; simply to report upon the capabilities of the soil as defined by this bill; not to examine into the number and kind of cattle or the diseases incident to them. Now is the gentleman convinced?

Mr. HUBBELL. I am not.

Mr. VALENTINE. I am sorry that I cannot convince him.

Mr. YOUNG. Does the gentleman propose to transfer the duties of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to this department?

Mr. VALENTINE. Not at all.

Mr. YOUNG. Why not?

Mr. VALENTINE. It has nothing to do with it.

Mr. HUBBELL. Will the gentleman allow me to say why I am not convinced?

Mr. VALENTINE. I have no time to yield for a speech.

Mr. HUBBELL. I do not want to make a speech.

Mr. VALENTINE. I am willing to yield for a question.

Mr. HUBBELL. I want to ask the gentleman why the bureau of animal industry, which gives all the information relating to animals, should not have also the duty of collecting information in regard to stock-raising?

Mr. VALENTINE. The general question of the manner of raising stock would belong to the one; the adaptability of the soil to stock-raising would belong to the other. One relates simply to the question of adaptability of land; the other to the raising of stock.

Mr. SHERWIN. If the object of the bureau of animal industry is simply the examination of "kinds, races, or breeds," why should the bureau be put in charge of a "competent veterinary surgeon?"

Mr. VALENTINE. It has a larger scope, as the measure itself shows. It is to report upon "the causes, prevention, or cure of contagious, communicable, or other diseases." It includes that subject, as well as the matter of stock-raising and the adaptability of soil. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] wish to ask me a question?

Mr. YOUNG. Oh, no; I will not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. VALENTINE. I will say to the gentleman that in this matter we have nothing whatever to do with the Commissioner of the General Land Office. We do not propose to take away any jurisdiction now belonging to him.

Mr. YOUNG. Why not take this whole question from the Commissioner of the General Land Office and put the subject in charge of this officer, or else omit this officer from the bill and clothe the Commissioner of the General Land Office with the statistical duties which you propose to vest in the officer named in the bill?

Mr. VALENTINE. As I understand the law, the only duties now devolving upon the Commissioner of the General Land Office are ministerial, and to a certain extent judicial. The Land Department surveys the public domain, determines which lands are mineral and which agricultural, and makes conveyances of the public lands to the people. This bill contemplates a further and a different purpose. I will say that it was the desire of a number of gentlemen that the committee should transfer the General Land Office to the Agricultural Department. In the opinion of these gentlemen the Agricultural Department was the proper place for the Land Office. But the committee holding to their desire to report simply an agricultural bill, have omitted that provision. If in the wisdom of the House it should be thought desirable to insert it, there will be no serious opposition.

Mr. YOUNG. You mean from the committee?

Mr. VALENTINE. I mean from the committee.

The proposed substitute of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HUBBELL,] instead of retaining the provision in regard to the bureau of statistics as reported in the original bill, provides that the secretary of agriculture shall call upon the Bureau of Statistics now existing under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury for all information in the possession of that bureau.

Now, it is the desire of the committee to create in this new department a bureau of statistics, which shall gather information accurately and disseminate it throughout this country for the benefit of agriculture. If any other industry is benefited at the same time, all right; but the primary object of this bill in every feature is the promotion of the interests of agriculture. In the first place, we desire that the agricultural community, embracing one-half the people of the United States, shall have a direct representative in the council chambers of this Government, so that when matters of great importance are being examined into by the Chief Executive with his advisors, the agriculturists may feel that whatever policy the Government may adopt their interests will be had in view, and they will have a voice in the determination of the question. I believe that nothing less than this will satisfy the agriculturists of this country.

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] proposes to take what is to-day an independent department, although not one of the Executive Departments, and make it a division under a secretary of industries. I affirm that he cannot find any farmers in the land who want such a measure adopted. Where is the petition from agriculturists asking that their interests be placed in charge of a bureau under the department of industries or any other department? Petitions from the farming community are here in great numbers, and they all ask the recognition of their great interests in an independent department.

I will read the provision of section 4 which contemplates the establishment of a bureau of statistics; and every man who will listen must I think be satisfied that we have in this provision all that can be desired touching the question of transportation and commerce:

Fourth. The bureau of statistics, the chief of which shall collect and report the agricultural statistics of the United States; and, in addition, all important information or statistics relating to industrial education and agricultural colleges; to labor and wages in this and other countries; to markets and prices.

Now I ask especial attention to the next provision:

To modes and cost of transporting agricultural products and live stock to their final market; to the demand, supply, and prices in foreign markets; to the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, their sources of raw material, methods, markets, and prices; to such commercial or other conditions as may affect the market value of farm products or the interests of the industrial classes of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, this covers the whole question of transportation. If this bill should become a law, the gentleman in charge of this bureau of statistics will be authorized and directed by law to examine into the whole system of transportation, whether interstate or external, and to report to the secretary of agriculture and through him to the agriculturists of the country.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] said that he proposed to offer an amendment directing the secretary of agriculture to publish the statistics at least once a week. If the gentleman will examine the latter portion of the paragraph to which I am now referring he will find this language:

And the secretary is hereby authorized to establish such divisions in this bureau and to make such monthly or other reports as he shall deem most effective for the prompt dissemination of such reliable information respecting crops and domestic and foreign markets as will be of service to the farmers or other industrialists of the United States.

The provisions of this bill are such that the secretary of agriculture, if he should deem it best for the farming or other industrial interests of the United States, may publish a bulletin every morning, which may be a portion of the reading matter in our daily papers; and the weekly papers may take these reports, collating them from day to day. We desire to place in the hands of the farmers of this country the means of understanding fully just what their crops are worth. We want them to have the benefit, if there be any, of a short crop in Europe or in any other portion of the world.

But as it now is this information is kept away from them, as it was last fall, until other countries (as France then did through agents who subsidized our newspapers for the time being to assist them) have beared the market, and then come in and bought 25,000,000 bushels, after which they have permitted the market to go up again, our farmers losing, as they did in the instance I have referred to, millions upon millions of dollars. It is in order to prevent this crying injustice to our own agriculturists that the committee have deemed it not only wise but imperative on their part to make this provision in the bill.

Mr. YOUNG. Let me ask the gentleman from Nebraska whether the leading papers of his State do not publish market reports.

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes; but we mean them to publish a market report that is authoritatively furnished by the Government of the United States, and not made up by boards of trade in the cities of Cincinnati, Chicago, and New York—made by men whose only object is to deceive the farmer and to make him believe his crop is only worth 50 cents a bushel when it is in reality worth a dollar. That is the object of this measure. We want to let the farmer have reliable information.

Mr. YOUNG. I wish to ask the gentleman from Nebraska whether, supposing this should be adopted, the Government in the end would not have to get its information from the very boards of trade he speaks of.

Mr. VALENTINE. No, sir; if I thought so I would be against it. Whomsoever the President in his wisdom may call to the head of this new executive department of agriculture will have the good sense undoubtedly to go among the farmers of the country and not to these boards of trade for his information. He will learn the facts from the farmers precisely as they exist, and not from any boards of trade who act wholly in the interest of speculators.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] delivered an excellent speech in favor of this measure. He said, however, that he thought the four divisions should be put into two so as to save expenses. I do not agree with him on that point. In his speech he spoke of Italy, little Italy, as he called it, having a minister of agriculture, with ten divisions, ten distinct and separate divisions for the consideration of the agricultural interests of that country. Yet he would have the great agricultural interests of the United States, the greatest perhaps of any nation on the globe, confided to the care of a department with two divisions.

Now, the Committee on Agriculture, charged with the interest of our agriculturists, have framed and reported a bill without regard to any other of the great industries of this country, and have provided a secretary, an assistant secretary, and four bureau officers. My friend, who is so good a friend to agriculture, as I know he is, is not, I am sure, going to permit the safety of this measure to be imperiled by insisting upon any amendment such as he suggests to save two officers. If he will look at the matter fairly he cannot fail to see that the pittance of $6,000 a year given to the agriculturists of the country by allowing the four bureaus to exist as reported by the committee must result to the interest and benefit of agriculture.

Mr. TYLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TYLER. If the bill passes as proposed, providing for the establishment of these four bureaus, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Nebraska whether he understands that it will be the imperative duty of the secretary to establish these four bureaus, leaving no discretionary power in his hands?

Mr. VALENTINE. If they be provided for in this bill, my judgment is that the secretary would be compelled to organize them. I hope the bill will pass by which this department of agriculture will be divided into four grand divisions for the protection of the great agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. TYLER. I ask the gentleman, that being so, whether in his judgment it would not be better to leave it to the discretion of the secretary to establish this bureau of statistics as well as this land bureau as the occasion may demand?

Mr. VALENTINE. I do not know. In my judgment there is not so much necessity for the establishment of this land bureau as for the establishment of the other three. I do not think that the department could readily get along without the other three.

The arid-land question is one which will soon become one of the greatest we will have to deal with. These lands constitute a great portion of this country now useless, but would be fertile if we could only have sufficient water for them. It is demonstrated if they could be irrigated and brought under cultivation they would furnish all the cereals this or any other country might need. The question of forestry, too, is becoming one of the greatest importance. This bureau of lands will have the consideration of these two items of important general interest to the country. We have also provided for a division in this bureau which shall be known as mines and mining, which we think a great necessity to the country.

Mr. TYLER. I understand the main distinction between this bill and the one presented by the Civil Service Reform Committee——

Mr. VALENTINE. What bill have you in your hand?

Mr. TYLER. Your bill. The distinction is that the bill of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] leaves it discretionary to the secretary of agriculture to establish these two additional divisions according to his discretion.

Mr. VALENTINE. It is not satisfactory to the committee. It requires the secretary to go to the Treasury Department to get his information. We believe that it would leave the department in a worse position after the passage of the Hubbell substitute than it is now; that its scope would not be so great, and that it would be compelled to rely upon another Department of the Government for its information. We feel that that would be fatal to the very object that this bill seeks to accomplish, and we regard it as wholly inadequate.

Under the head of statistics there is another provision which I would read, as I have not read it before, and to which I ask the attention of members, for the reason that I feel satisfied many of them at least have not read the bill carefully. I refer to the provision which relates to statistics as to the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, the sources of their raw material, the methods, markets, and prices, and such commercial and other conditions as may affect the market value of farm products or the interests of the industrial classes of the country. The fifth clause of the bill is as follows:

SEC. 5. That all laws and parts of laws relating to the Department of Agriculture now in existence, as far as the same are applicable and not in conflict with this act, and only so far, are continued in full force and effect.

Now, the gentleman from Michigan says that we are creating a department, with a secretary of agriculture—and so far he is correct—and four bureau officers, and that yet we have not a chief clerk. He says his bill provides for a chief clerk and our bill does not, and therefore for that reason we should vote for his bill. Now, the gentleman will observe that this section 5 does not legislate the chief clerk out of office, but on the contrary it makes provision for continuing in force such laws as are applicable and not in conflict with this act and which are now in force. Now, the chief clerk is provided for by law already.

Mr. HUBBELL. Will the gentleman tell me what powers and duties are left by his proposed bill of the old law? If you have a commissioner of agriculture, what are his powers and duties?

Mr. VALENTINE. We have no commissioner of agriculture. The officer designated by this bill is entirely different. If I had time to take up the law in the four minutes which I have remaining I would be able to show the gentleman that we have an officer in charge of these departments who has powers as absolute and certainly more extensive than those which are now exercised by the Commissioner, and point out the powers and duties to which he refers. All the powers touching the divisions of botany, entomology, and chemistry are left precisely as they are now. They are somewhat qualified here and placed in the bureau of practical agriculture, where the committee thought they properly belonged. That is all we establish. We directed simply where they should go, and where, under each of these four different heads, the committee believed these different divisions should be assigned.

The gentleman has said a good deal concerning the provisions of the bill that certain officers mentioned should be practical agriculturists. We felt that it was the duty of Congress in legislating upon a question of such importance as this to limit executive patronage in that direction. We did not desire the offices to be peddled out politically; but we all thought at least that two of these men should be practical agriculturists, and that these positions should not be given wholly for political reasons.

My friend from Michigan says he does not think as much of this seed-distributing portion of the bill and of that department as do some other gentlemen. But I am not surprised at that, because his constituency are not much interested in seed distribution.

Mr. HUBBELL. I beg the gentleman's pardon; they are greatly interested in it.

Mr. VALENTINE. Then I have been misinformed.

Mr. HUBBELL. I have eighteen agricultural counties in my district.

Mr. VALENTINE. And how many agriculturists?

Mr. HUBBELL. Seventy-five thousand.

Mr. VALENTINE. Agricultural people?

Mr. HUBBELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. VALENTINE. Then I was wrongly informed, and I apologize for that. I naturally supposed the only interest the gentleman had in his district was copper.

Mr. HUBBELL. There are twenty-eight counties in my district, and two of them are copper-producing counties.

Mr. VALENTINE. Well, be that as it may, I desire no quarrel with my friend.

Mr. HUBBELL. You cannot have it. I will not quarrel with you, but you ought to post yourself.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think the bill of the gentleman, as I was going on to say, is wholly inadequate.

It may be that the bill of the committee is not the wisest that could be framed. I doubt that it is. But a large number of bills were sent to the committee. Members on both sides of the House, representing all sections of the country, sent their bills to the committee. It appeared on assembling that four or five members of the committee had bills of their own, and each member representing a different interest desired a peculiar construction of language in framing the bill. Now this bill is a compromise between all of these different measures. We believe we cover every interest in the bill, dividing the department into four grand divisions, which are necessary, in the judgment of the committee, to protect, elevate, and foster the practical agriculture of the country.

If you give our bill, as we ask at your hands, a fair chance, I think it will be found to produce great advantages, and that much good will come not only to the agricultural interests of the land, which are now about to receive for the first time a substantial recognition by Congress, but that it will give to all other interests and industries the advantages which naturally follow from their dependence upon agriculture, and that it will inure to the glory and renown of the country itself. I ask this of the House on behalf of the Committee on Agriculture: I ask you to vote down both substitutes offered for this bill. We believe it to be our duty to resist the passage of the substitutes, both the one offered by the gentleman from Michigan and that offered by my friend from West Virginia. We feel that it would simply absorb the present independent Department of Agriculture, making a bureau or department with an entirely different name and without practical good.

In the opinion of the committee, the substitute of the gentleman from Michigan is wholly inadequate, and destroys the very best features of the bill and of the ideas we desire to perpetuate in the elevation of this Department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, all general debate by order of the House on this bill is now closed. The House will proceed to the consideration of the bill by sections for amendment.

Mr. KENNA. I would like to ask a parliamentary question: Whether the proposed substitute should now be sent to the desk to be read, or whether it should be left till the bill has been amended?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the proper course is first to perfect the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I call for the reading of the first section.

Mr. HUBBELL. I want to know in what position the substitutes for this bill now stand. Particularly I desire to know the status of the substitute proposed by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will first be considered by sections for amendment, and when the original text of the bill is perfected, then substitutes will be in order.

Mr. HUBBELL. I want to know in what order?

Mr. VALENTINE. Under the rules of the House I understand the bill will now be read by sections for amendment to perfect the original text of the bill. There are some amendments offered by the committee. After the original bill is perfected we will then vote on the substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already directed the reading of the bill by sections. The Clerk will report the first section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Department of Agriculture, established at the seat of government of the United States, shall be an Executive Department, under the supervision and control of a secretary of agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and section 158 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to include such department, and the provisions of title 4 of the Revised Statutes are hereby made applicable to said department.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand the bill is now being read by sections for consideration and amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. MONEY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. What will become of these amendments if the substitute passes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They will have the fate of the original bill.

Mr. MONEY. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to ask the Chair if amendments are now in order. I desire to ask this question: If amendments are in order and an amendment is offered to the first section, do we vote on that after debate? If so, when the bill is perfected and the substitute is offered——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When debate is ended on the amendment a vote will be taken, and the House will in that way proceed through the bill to its close. Then a substitute will be in order.

Mr. MONEY. Are the amendments that may be adopted to the bill carried over to the substitute?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are amendments to the original bill and not to the substitute.

Mr. MONEY. Suppose amendments are offered to the substitute and agreed to?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then they will attach to the substitute.

Mr. KENNA. I desire in this connection to state, for the information of the gentleman from Mississippi, so far as the substitute offered by me is concerned, the first part of it embraces the present bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND.]

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6 of section 1, after the words "shall be," insert the words "a practical agriculturist, to be;" so it will read:

"Shall be an executive department, under the supervision and control of a secretary of agriculture, who shall be a practical agriculturist, to be appointed by the President," &c.

Mr TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have no desire to make a speech on this bill or on the amendment. The amendment is easily understood.

The bill is designed to establish an agricultural department, pure and simple, without any complication from the introduction of commerce or any other branch of the Government departments. The amendment I have offered is simply for the purpose of declaring that the President shall appoint one as chief of the agricultural department, who is a practical farmer. It strikes me as eminently proper that he who presides over the agricultural interests of the country should be thoroughly familiar with them as a practical agriculturist. I do not wish to discuss the question any further, and yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCOID.]

Mr. MCCOID. Mr. Speaker, I favor this bill—

1. Because it will give deserved recognition to the great industry which stands highest in rank in importance, in dignity, and independence in our country.

2. Because with it will begin an organization of those engaged in that industry, the farmers of America, which I hope will result in such complete unity as will enable them to assert the controlling influence which of right belongs to this interest because of its extent and its merit.

3. Because it will contribute to the prosperity of the country by advancing the usefulness, intelligence, and success of the people who compose the sturdy, reliable frame-work of American society, American politics, and American religion.

Mr. Speaker, there is contained in each of these thoughts the subject-matter of an argument which would exhaust much more time than I think it necessary to occupy.

The just recognition, the organization, and the success of agriculturists of America is a theme worthy of more extended consideration by Congress than any that in my judgment can come before it. It stands at the head of all our industries; to it all are subordinate and contributory. As such I want it to be enthroned and honored nationally. Those traits of character which make up the pure, independent, patriotic, obedient, and industrious citizen are learned best on the farm. Therefore, I want the voice of the agriculturist as such to be heard in counsels of the Cabinet and his annual suggestions to be submitted to Congress and the country.

I believe in small farms, in—

> The little house well filled,
> And the little farm well tilled.

And in this country we have it with its healthful influences. But these small farmers are in this divided and independent work all in an age of combinations, monopolies, and corporations; they are in the unnatural strife left largely defenseless. They need organization and preservation in all their rights, and they need it in such a way as not to lose that simplicity and purity, that nobility and justness of character, which crowns their pursuits with such halo now. This organization will come, in my judgment, through the organization of this department and its enlarged and practical character as contemplated by this measure. I regard this as but the initiative of such an organization as should be perfected, some of the plans for which are maturing and will follow it.

The success of any interest quickly follows when it has the natural resources, the contributing forces of nature's laws, yielding obedience to well-directed labor, and when it is recognized and organized to exert its power. This will be the case with agriculture should that pursuit meet with the just protection and encouragement to which it is entitled. There are questions of detail which must be left for the future, but they will come in their order and time.

Sir, amid all the avocations of this country none should be so near the heart of its chosen legislators as this. It is said that in China on the annual festal day when the plowing season begins, about the middle of February—

The Emperor in person, clothed in his sacerdotal robes, sets the example to his subjects by breaking the ground, guiding the plow with his own hands, and sowing the seed. This festival is conducted with great eclat and ceremony. All those who are to assist in the ceremonies are commanded to fast for three days previous thereto. On the morning of the festival day the Emperor, attended by the great officers of state, repairs to the temple of earth where he makes sacrifices and implores a blessing on the labors of the husbandmen, that they may produce plentiful harvests; and when these rites are ended the emperor then descends and plows a few furrows and sows five sorts of grain, after which twelve of his chief ministers or grandees plow and sow in turn, and then the work is finished by regular husbandmen who each receive a piece of Nankin cloth. The produce of this imperial field is preserved in a granary by itself and used only for solemn sacrifices. Through the provinces a similar ceremony is performed, though different in its details.

It is thus that the rulers by both precept and example stimulate their subjects to agricultural pursuits.—Lecture on China by D. P. Stubbs.

This is our great specialty, our natural monopoly, and it is the noblest labor of life. There has been no truer sentiment uttered in all these centuries than that of Virgil:

O happy, if he knew his happy state,
The swain, who, free from bus'ness and debate,
Receives his easy food from Nature's hand,
And just returns of cultivated land!
No palace, with a lofty gate, he wants,
T'admit the tides of early visitants,
With eager eyes devouring as they pass,
The breathing figures of Corinthian brass.
No statues threaten, from high pedestals;
No Persian arras hides his homely walls.
With antic vests, which, through their shady fold,
Betray the streaks of ill-dissembled gold:
He boasts no wool, whose native white is dy'd
With purple poison of Assyrian pride:
No costly drugs of Araby defile,
With foreign scents, the sweetness of his oil:
But easy quiet, a secure retreat,
A harmless life that knows not how to cheat,
With home-bred plenty, the rich owner bless;
And rural pleasures crown his happiness.
Unvex'd with quarrels, undisturb'd with noise,
The country king his peaceful realm enjoys—
Cool grots and living lakes, the flow'ry pride
Of meads, and streams that through the valley glide,
And shady groves that easy sleep invite,
And, after toilsome days, a soft repose at night.

From these retreats of virtue the best men of every age have and will come. To its memories, though they be those of childhood and boyhood, men turn from the cares of every station and the fatigues of every work of life, and are soothed again to peace, and at its shrine they gladly lay down their offerings, and for its success they ever offer their sincerest prayers, and, though they are separated by the duties of life, they ever carry with them a longing to return to its peace and its purity.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to give briefly the reasons why I cannot consent to this bill. It is a long stride in the direction of consolidation. It is a bill to create permanently another Government bureau and to create another Cabinet officer. It gives an assistant secretary and four chiefs of bureaus with large salaries. We ought not to make so grave a change in our governmental structure without good reasons. I am in favor of doing anything and everything that will increase the efficiency of the Agricultural Department. If it needs more help I am willing to give it more help; if it needs more money I am willing to give it more money; but why should we make it a political machine? That will be the effect of this bill. Its effect will be, not as the gentleman who last addressed the House said, to organize the farmers, but to organize a bureau to control the farmers. I do not speak solely with reference to this Administration, or solely with reference to the Republican administration, for it has been the case under Democrats and Republicans that the different bureaus of this Government were more or less political machines.

What is the difference between the Agricultural Department and any of the other Departments of this Government? In what does it consist? Simply and solely, sir, in this: that the head of every other Department is a political adviser of the President and an active, working politician. The present Commissioner of Agriculture is a business man; he conducts his department on business principles. He is a man of ability and high character, but if this bill passes I doubt whether he would be made a Cabinet officer. However that may be, it is not now a question of men. He or any other person at the head of that Department would become a politician. It would necessarily be so. Every Cabinet officer is not only the adviser of the President but also the political head of a bureau. The Secretary of State superintends the appointment of consuls and advises as to the appointment of ministers. All these are appointed not only to carry out the President's foreign policy, but also with the view of sustaining his party and his individual aspirations. With the Secretary of the Treasury it is the same thing. Not only the heads of bureaus, but customs officers and internal-revenue officers and weighers and gaugers—all these are made political appointments.

So of the appointments under the Secretary of the Interior, and especially so with regard to the Postmaster-General. Every postmaster, from the highest to the lowest, is appointed where partisans of the administration can be had from among those partisans. Even the Department of Justice is prostituted to the same purpose. Not only are judges and clerks appointed all from one party, but marshals, the ministers of the law, are chosen with reference to their capacity to pack conventions and manage political campaigns. These things have caused our Presidential elections to become little else than scrambles for spoils.

Do gentlemen want to subject the Agricultural Department, which is for the benefit of the farmers of the whole country without reference to party, to the same influences? I have listened carefully, Mr. Speaker, to several of the speeches which have been made in advocacy of this bill, and I failed to discover any tangible reason given by any speaker why the head of the Agricultural Department should go into the Cabinet and become a politician, save one. All the gentlemen, with singular unanimity, say they wish to dignify the agriculturists. Do gentlemen seriously believe that this Congress, by legislation, can dignify the farmer or the farmer's occupation?

Why, sir, it seems to me to be an imputation on the farmer to say that he needs this or any other special legislation to dignify him or his calling. Agriculture is not more honorable than other honorable occupations; but I think I may say without disparagement that it is the noblest of all employments, because the most independent. But why single out the farmer alone and say you wish to dignify him by special legislation? Do you really think he needs it? We have no separate bureau of manufactures; we have no separate bureau of mining; we have no separate bureau of commerce. Do you think the calling or occupation of farmer needs to be sugar-coated or gilded to make it equal to others? For myself I do not, and I shall never put my vote here on any such grounds. I would willingly vote for this bill if I could see the benefit that would come to the farmer. I do not stop to inquire into the constitutionality of the measure.

The bureau has been too long established for me to undertake to discuss that question now. To make its chief an adviser of the President is perhaps as much warranted by the Constitution as to have a department at all. I do not, therefore, place my opposition on that ground, but I am opposed to "creating a swarm of new offices to eat out the substance" of our people; to giving the Executive more patronage, more glittering prizes to bestow as the rewards of partisan service than he has now, especially when everything that can be done for the farmer can be done by promoting the efficiency of the present Department of Agriculture, which is as nearly non-political as such a department can be. No gentleman can deny that the President would, if the chief of the Agricultural Department is made a Cabinet officer, appoint a politician to the place; no gentleman can deny that he would appoint to each of the four bureaus provided for a politician.

It would thus become a compact political machine, costing for the six political offices provided for $25,000 a year more than is now paid to the commissioner. It is the tendency of every Department to multiply its officers indefinitely. If we thus multiply the officers of this department by one act where will we stop?

Mr. Speaker, there is no analogy between the proposed bureau and any of the other bureaus we now have, with Cabinet officers at their heads. We have seven Cabinet officers now; but each of them is in charge of some portion of those duties devolved by the Constitution on the Executive.

The Secretary of State has charge of the consular and diplomatic service; the Secretary of the Treasury is in charge of finance; the Secretary of War of the Army; the Secretary of the Navy of the Navy; the Secretary of the Interior of lands, patents, pensions, &c.; the Department of Justice of the executive officers of courts; the Postmaster-General of post-offices and post-roads.

But, sir, our fathers never intended to put the people of this country under the charge of the Government or any bureau of the Government. The Government was intended to be put in charge of the people; to be their servant, not their master. All the departments of this Government should be for the benefit of the farmers as well as of all the people. What is a bureau that the farmer should be content with that if the other departments are against him?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Do you want to keep the farmer out of politics?

Mr. HERBERT. No.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. If you do you will find it very difficult.

Mr. HERBERT. I do not want a bureau organized to control the farmer, and that will be the result of this scheme, so far as political influences can effect that result. This bureau, with its head in the Cabinet, taking its political complexion from the administration, giving its political aid to the administration, reaching out through its sub-bureaus all over the country, ramifying in every direction, touching the people at all points, will be a most powerful political machine. The farmers do want legislation for their benefit. They are tired of being taxed for the benefit of other classes. They want relief from burdensome taxation. If this bureau is established, and if the Administration is in favor of a high-protective tariff then all the power, all the influence, all the instrumentalities of the bureau will be used to keep the high-protective tariff upon them. Mr. Speaker, as I said to the gentleman from New York, I do not want to keep the farmers out of politics. I think they should take more interest in politics, and I only wish the farmers of the North and West would send representatives here charged not to subordinate their interests to the interests of other classes.

Gentlemen tell us that Austria has a bureau of agriculture, with a cabinet officer. Prussia has, and Italy has. Kings and princes, sir, may need bureaus to prop and keep them in power, but the free people of free America do not wish to create a political bureau to fight against them when they are contending for their rights; and gentlemen need not imagine that the farmers of America, when they are demanding justice, will be pacified by such a hollow mockery as this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROWNE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "practical."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That would be simply equivalent to a motion to lay the amendment on the table, for that is all there is in the amendment.

Mr. BROWNE. I have offered an amendment to the amendment. Is it in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let me ask general leave for members to print their remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That has already been granted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to make a point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, that it is virtually a motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BROWNE. That is an argument against my amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I raise the point of order on the gentleman's amendment that it proposes to strike out the word "practical," which is all there is of the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MONEY. There are other words in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] besides the one the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] proposes to strike out.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I misunderstood the amendment of the gentleman and will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BROWNE. It is perhaps well known, at least by many gentlemen who sit near me, that I have not been able to comprehend the necessity for this bill. It seems to me that everything that is proposed by it may be accomplished by the present bureau of agriculture, if we but simply enlarge its powers and increase the appropriations for its support.

There are many reasons, if I had the time to give them, why agriculture, so large and important an interest as it is, occupies no such relations to the Government as to make it either necessary or proper that it should be represented in the councils of the Executive. I would cheerfully vote to enlarge the powers of this bureau, and will join gentlemen on both sides of the House in pronouncing eulogies upon the hard-fisted yeomanry of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I am myself a practical farmer. I have held the plow as it turned the furrow. I have done something in the way of reaping broad swathes in the golden harvest field. I have carried the jug to the reapers. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENNA. Did it get there in good condition? [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE. It was in as good condition when I got to the field as when I started. What do the farmers of the country want? It is not some one clothed with a little brief authority to attend Cabinet meetings. That is a matter of little consequence to them. As you elevate the head of the department you will simply put him further from the people. We want a department of agriculture the head of which is one whom the farmer can approach.

This bill proposes to divide this department up into bureaus; that is proper enough. May not this division be made as well under the system that now exists as if you should create a secretary of agriculture? In other words, what do you do by creating a secretary of agriculture except to make a new officer, to increase salaries, and increase expenditures of the people's money from the Treasury? That is all.

That which is to-day most vicious in American politics is the disposition to multiply places so as to provide offices for our cousins and brothers-in-law and those who manipulate political affairs in our counties and towns. I want an efficient system of agriculture; I want to appropriate money from the Treasury to promote agricultural interests. I would appropriate it, if you please, for the purchase and distribution of seeds; for making investigations in regard to the diseases of domestic animals, in regard to insects that are destructive of forests and shade-trees. I would make appropriations for investigations to cover every proper subject of investigation. I want to vote money for this purpose, but not to pay salaries for new officers such as those to be created by this bill.

The SPEAKRR pro tempore The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McMILLIN. I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BROWNE.] In doing so I do not propose to controvert all he has said. There is too much truth in his statement that the tendency of our legislation now is (and it is a tendency that I regret to see in this bill) to multiply places, to increase salaries, as well as to magnify offices. There is hardly a day passes that this tendency is not manifested here. The office holder or seeker has many friends; the Treasury few.

I think that if we are to have a secretary of agriculture at all his profession ought not to belie his title, and therefore I am opposed to this amendment of my friend from Indiana. But I wish to warn Representatives that mere statutory provisions for places will not satisfy the farmer. It will not do to go to the farmer and merely tell him that we have elevated his calling. What he wants is practical help in the reduction of taxes and purification of government; such help as this bill does not give; such help as the making of a new Cabinet officer will not give.

I shall vote for this bill to make the head of the Agricultural Department a cabinet officer because I am willing to try the experiment. But I realize that there have been better bills killed during this session, and there will be more killed before adjournment, that offered the farmer more substantial help than is afforded or promised by this. When you clamorers for high tariffs go to your constituents and tell them we have made a Cabinet officer of the Commissioner of Agriculture, how will you meet their reply that while you have done this you have refused to take the high duty off their clothes, salt, iron, and books?

Pollok, in his Course of Time, tells us of the hypocrite who, "with one hand put a penny into the urn of poverty and with the other took a shilling out." I suppose there is no one in this House who intends to play the roll of Pollok's character. But members remind me of him when by one vote they offer the farmer a quieting bauble in the shape of official elevation of one agriculturist, and by another perpetuate every burden past legislation has placed on all farmers.

You profess to have the interest of the farmer at heart. You go forth with loud professions in his behalf. You say that you assemble here to legislate for him. Every man proclaims his readiness to serve the dear farmer. Let us see how the professions are practiced. The State of my friends from Ohio [Messrs. YOUNG and CONVERSE] is engaged in tobacco production; so is Indiana; so are Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Virginia, Tennessee, and North Carolina. What do you do for the farmers engaged in this one of our greatest agricultural interests? They must go and hunt up a licensed dealer before they can even sell any part of their product. And this Congress, with all its professions, has refused all relief.

Thus, while you say you are for the farmer, you decline to give him any substantial relief. You propose to send up an official balloon in his presence and say to him, "There is substance for you; there is a Cabinet officer in charge of your interests. We have elevated agriculture; we have greatly helped you." Those who really have the interests of agriculture at heart take what they can get, but notify you that more is demanded and more must be given. They want release from unnecessary tax burdens. The cry in every quarter is, "We are deeply interested in the agricultural people," yet the very substance of help you deny. I have risen to say that this will not satisfy the farmer, and this Congress ought to mend its ways by inaugurating substantial legislation for the agricultural interests, instead of increasing the length of his protestations. The 2,100 national banks can secure action by this Congress much more quickly than can the millions who till the soil. The Ways and Means Committee do not hesitate to report bills back for their relief. But to them the pleading voice of the masses ascends in vain.

The question being taken on the amendment to strike out, before the word "agriculturist," the word "practical," the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6 of section 1, after the words "shall be," insert "a practical agriculturist, to be."

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment of my colleague by inserting, before "practical," the words "experienced and." Mr. Speaker, I need say but little in support of this amendment. We are now considering a measure for the benefit of agriculture. We have pending before us a bill by which it is proposed to do honor to that large and important class of persons known as farmers. A great deal has been said about the importance of agriculture. Now, if agriculture is so important as to require a representative in the Cabinet of the Chief Executive of the United States, then I insist that no one is fit to represent that interest unless he is an experienced and practical farmer.

Would you think of taking a man who is distinguished in another profession than the law and putting him upon the Supreme Bench? Would you select for such a position a man who had never won distinction by the practice of the legal profession? Then, I say, when we are proposing to do something for the farmers let us give them real honor by appointing to this position one of their own class.

Unless we are willing to do this it is all humbug to be talking about this bill being for the benefit of the farmers. I will vote against any bill, I do not care what it is, that does not place at the head of this new department an experienced and practical farmer, and every one who has respect for the agricultural classes of the country should do likewise. When we are proposing to do honor to the farmers of the country, let us give them the full benefit. Let us not take a man because he has distinguished himself in some other field and put him at the head of this department. Let us take a man who has distinguished himself on his own farm, who has a reputation in the field of agriculture. Let us not go out among politicians, or lawyers, or doctors for a representative of the farming interest. This I think is all that is necessary to be said on this subject.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I accept the amendment of my colleague as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, this bill, as reported by the subcommittee to the main committee included substantially the language which the gentleman from Illinois proposes to insert. Yet the committee afterward came to the conclusion that it was better to leave out that provision respecting the secretary of agriculture. While providing that the assistant secretary and the chief of the bureau should be practical agriculturists, we thought that for the position of secretary it might be necessary to choose a man with executive and administrative ability. There is no especial objection on the part of the committee to the amendment, but after full consideration they came to the conclusion——

Mr. ATKINS. I would like to know whether the gentleman means to say that we cannot find an experienced executive officer among farmers?

Mr. VALENTINE. No, sir; I do not say that.

Mr. ATKINS. That is what you mean; is it not?

Mr. VALENTINE. The committee came to the conclusion that they might leave it to the Chief Executive to choose this officer without undertaking to prescribe certain requirements that he should have.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My friend from Nebraska [Mr. VALENTINE] wants a politician in the office, I presume.

Mr. VALENTINE. No, sir; I do not want a politician. Why does not the law require that the Secretary of the Navy shall be a practical sailor, or that the Secretary of War shall have been educated to the art of war?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether the distinguished gentleman who now presides over the Department of Agriculture is not a practical and experienced agriculturist?

Mr. VALENTINE. I think he is, and a very good one.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Permit me to add that the single State of Illinois can furnish a thousand farmers who, like him, are capable not only of discharging the duties of this office but of adorning any position under the Government of the United States.

Mr. VALENTINE. Do not use up my time, please. It may be a violent presumption that the next President of the United States may be a Democrat, but if such should turn out to be the case he would turn out our present excellent Commissioner of Agriculture. I think we had better leave it as it is. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have accepted the amendment of my colleague as a modification of my proposition; and the question, therefore, is on my proposition as modified.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the question now pending.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. We are in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, and I ask the Chair whether we cannot have the yeas and nays on my proposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

The question was put on Mr. TOWNSHEND's amendment as modified, and the Speaker pro tempore decided in his judgment the noes had it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VALENTINE. I make the point of order that the call for yeas and nays is not in order.

Mr. HASKELL. The House is acting as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule. That was the order of the House, and the yeas and nays cannot be in order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. We are in the House nevertheless.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And are under the rules of the House. The yeas and nays are in order.

Mr. HASKELL. The House is acting as in Committee of the Whole, and the only difference is that the Speaker is in the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the yeas and nays may be ordered, just as it is in order when the House is considering a bill as in Committee of the Whole the previous question may be ordered. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois as modified by the amendment of his colleague.

Mr. ANDERSON. In order to save time, and in behalf of the Committee on Agriculture, I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois as it has been modified.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That may be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order for the yeas and nays is vacated.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. The amendment of my colleague as modified has been accepted by the committee.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. That is satisfactory.

The second section of the bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That there shall be in said department an assistant secretary of agriculture, who shall be a practical agriculturist, and the several chiefs of the bureaus hereinafter named, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of four years, who shall perform such duties as may be required by law or prescribed by the secretary.

Mr. VALENTINE. I move to strike out the words "for a term of four years."

Mr. HUBBELL. I move to amend that by striking out these words: "to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of four years."

It occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is rather an anomaly to have these bureau officers appointed by the President of the United States for a term of four years when such is not the case with the bureau officers of any of the other Executive Departments. Take the Navy Department, for instance; the Secretary of the Navy names all the chiefs of bureaus in that Department. If there are any exceptions it is where it has been made so by some special law.

Now, if this Department of Agriculture is created, it seems to me that it is to be organized so as to have at its head, as we are told by the committee, a man who will be near to the farmer and understand his interests. If this bill is passed it is certain the secretary of agriculture will have nothing else to do but to be near the farmer. I do not wish to criticise it unnecessarily. I have examined it critically in relation to the law as it now exists. The last section provides that all laws and parts of laws relating to the Department of Agriculture now in existence, so far as the same are applicable and not in conflict with this act, and only so far, are continued in full force and effect. But the act creating the Department of Agriculture, authorizing heads of bureaus to take charge of each and every subject referred to that department in connection with the present laws, will leave nothing for the secretary to do, because, as I have said, everything under the present law is taken away from him and referred to others.

I think I ought to be allowed to say, in opposition to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, that I believe I do understand this bill. He seems to think I doubt the capacity of the committee to prepare and report a bill on this subject.

Now, I did doubt, but I will be frank and say to the gentleman that that doubt is removed; for I am satisfied now that there is not a member of the committee who can get upon his feet and say what powers and duties are left to the secretary of agriculture in this bill, or tell this House what there is left after the formation of these bureaus to the secretary. No gentleman upon the committee, I venture to assert, can say.

Mr. VALENTINE. I do not know that it makes any difference either one way or the other as to what powers and duties may be left to the secretary of agriculture if this bill is passed. If there is nothing left, there is something preserved in the bill. If there is anything left it is not interfered with. We believe it is not necessary, therefore, to undertake to enlighten the gentleman from Michigan. We propose to let him find out for himself. It is not necessary for the purpose of passing this bill through the House that we stop to inquire what is necessary to be done to inform the gentleman upon that point. But I hope the amendment will not prevail. He says, why not apply this same principle to this, as to the other Departments?

Why, Mr. Speaker, we have done with reference to this Department of Agriculture exactly what has been done with reference to the other Departments, and nothing more. It provides an assistant secretary and the heads of the several bureaus just as in the other Departments. If the gentleman will examine he will find that the Secretary of the Interior, the head of that Department, has under him the Commissioner of the Land Office, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Commissioner of Patents, the Commissioner of Pensions, and that other Departments are organized on the same principle. These bureaus specified in this bill are to be placed upon a footing, and a corresponding footing, with bureaus now existing under the various Departments of the Government, the heads of which are to be appointed by the President, with the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. EVINS. I desired, Mr. Speaker, some time during this debate, to express my views upon this important question and to state my objections to this bill. Under the rules of the House, however, I could not obtain an opportunity to do so; and in the short time allowed me now I cannot undertake, even in the most cursory way, to go over the ground I intended.

I agree, Mr. Speaker, entirely with the remarks of my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] and of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BROWNE.] I represent a constituency nine-tenths of whom are devoted to agriculture, and if I stood here simply to recommend myself to the favor of my constituents I might remain silent and vote for this bill. But it is because I believe that no more serious blow could be struck at the agricultural interests of the country than will fall upon them by the enactment of this bill into law that I feel compelled even within the five minutes allowed me to enter my protest against it.

I am opposed to it, in the first place, because it seeks to turn over the vast and important interests of twenty millions of our people to a scheming politician to be manipulated by him for selfish and party ends.

If gentlemen earnestly seek, as they declare, the welfare of the farmers of the country, why should they insist on making the department a political machine by converting the commissioner into a politician and partisan?

As a Cabinet officer he will carry with him all the great interests committed to his charge into the muddy whirlpool of politics. He will possess great power for working mischief, and I fear will exercise little of it for good. With agents and correspondents in every State, he will keep the political pot boiling, whether the farmer has anything to boil in his or not. The department or bureau, which ever it may be, ought to be entirely divorced from politics, and none of its offices should constitute rewards for party service. If any farmer is deceived by this so-called effort to "dignify agriculture" he will find, I fear, when it may be too late, that a desire to capture the "granger vote" had more to do with the passage of the bill than any real desire to advance his welfare.

If the design of the bill is to promote agricultural interests it would seem, in the first place, we ought to have at the head of the department one distinguished for his agricultural knowledge and skill, one who is devoted to agricultural science and has no ambition to shine in the political world.

He should be maintained in office for a series of years, so that the country might have the benefit of those vast stores of information which can be gathered alone by experience and patient industry.

If it were possible to have the office filled by such a man we might then hope to see some of the good results which the friends of this bill claim will flow from its adoption. But no such man is wanted, and none such need apply. A first requisite would be a record of distinguished services rendered the party in power, and influence and ability to manage the politics of whole States. The duties expected of him by his chief would require little knowledge of farming, of sheep husbandry, or the diseases of domestic animals. He would be expected to take care of the grangers politically.

I agree entirely with my distinguished friend from Indiana that there is no necessity for such a bill as this. The present machinery of the Agricultural Bureau is all that is necessary; and I am willing to give the Commissioner all the money he needs to make it work efficiently. If I was in favor of making any change at all it would be in the direction of giving the Commissioner the assistance of a board, to meet at stated intervals and to consult and confer with him in regard to the agricultural needs of the country. I would have one member of this board from the North, one from the South, one from the East, and one from the West, and they should, as I said, at stated times meet and consult with the Commissioner just in the manner suggested by Washington himself, as quoted by some of the gentlemen who have spoken upon this bill. His opinion was that this interest should be managed by a board.

I am sorry that time will not permit me to develop my ideas in reference to how this agricultural bureau should be managed. But, sir, the greatest objection which I have to urge against this bill, and one upon which I should have been glad to have spoken at length, is its increase of the already vast patronage of the Government. This is the rock upon which I fear our ship of state is yet to be wrecked. This alone would furnish me with sufficient reason to vote against this measure.

Do you want to add still more to your one hundred thousand office-holders? Do you want to increase the spoils of office—to debauch still more the people, the people who are the hope and strength of the country, the agricultural people; they who breathe the pure air of the country; they who live in the fields; they who are far removed from the corrupting influence of the towns and cities; they who have been in times past and are now the most devoted friends of an honest and economical government, and the stoutest defenders of republican institutions, pure and simple, as given us by our fathers?

Where will this new departure lead to? The friends of commerce, of manufactures, of mines and mining, will each want a separate department and a representative in the Cabinet. How many additional officers and employés will this saddle upon the Government? Why, sir, at this rate the District of Columbia will soon be too small to hold the buildings which will be necessary to accommodate the office-holders. Where will be the benefit to the farmers, already burdened with unjust taxation? If you would establish a bureau of information to instruct them in regard to the enormities of our present system of taxation, of which they bear so unjust a part, you would indeed do them a service, for they would then apply a speedy remedy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan to the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska. The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to strike out the second section, which provides for the appointment of an assistant secretary of agriculture.

We have by the change adopted in the first section provided for a secretary of agriculture who shall be a practical agriculturist. In the second section we provide for an assistant secretary of agriculture who shall be a practical agriculturist. Under the third section we provide there shall be a bureau of agricultural products, and that the chief of that bureau shall be a practical agriculturist.

This is a new department of government we are forming. It is yet to be determined whether it is to embrace as the objects of its care and attention more than agriculture. It seems to me that a secretary, with the various bureaus provided for, meets all the necessities of the case, and that this assistant secretary is simply a supernumerary, and that his office, for the present at least, is a useless one. While I would wish to do everything to give efficiency to this department, if created, I do not wish to lumber it up at the beginning with useless supernumerary and unnecessary offices. And it is not from hostility to the bill, but from friendship to the bill and to strip it of unnecessary expenditures, that I propose to strike out so much as creates an assistant secretary.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I am in favor of establishing a department of agriculture and of putting a practical farmer at the head of it. I do not want a clergyman there; I do not want a doctor there, not even a horse-doctor, unless he is a practical farmer. But it seems to me when we have provided for one practical farmer to be at the head of the department, that is enough. We do not need an assistant secretary, in my judgment. I think the secretary, with his chief clerk and with the heads of the bureaus, can manage for a year or two without having an assistant secretary who shall also be a practical farmer. Therefore, I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Texas so as to strike out only so much of the first and second lines of the section as provides for an assistant secretary of agriculture.

The Clerk read the amendment offered by Mr. VAN VOORHIS, as follows:

In section 2, strike out these words:

"An assistant-secretary of agriculture, who shall be a practical agriculturist, and."

Mr. ANDERSON. I wish to be heard in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from New York. Fully one-half of the people of this country are dependent upon the farm for their support. Fully one-half of the voters of this American nation are farmers. Here comes a measure for the purpose of doing them some good, and it is met with all sorts of ridicule and all sorts of attempts to take the very life out of this proposed bill.

I believe as firmly as I believe in a God that that bill, if adopted, if put in force, if liberally maintained, will be of incalculable benefit to the very men of this country who really constitute this country, when you come to the question of power. As to the matter of expense, where you have fully one-half the people of this nation coming here and asking to receive some benefit, when a question is raised that by leaving out the assistant secretary or so many clerks we will save so much expense, I say, in the name of God let us have a little of breadth in this matter; let us have something as broad as are the interests involved.

Mr. HUBBELL. That is what I am trying to insist upon.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. VAN VOORHIS to strike out the words "an assistant secretary of agriculture, who shall be a practical agriculturist, and," it was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] which is to strike out the entire second section.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to read section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of collecting and disseminating all important and useful information concerning agriculture, and also concerning such scientific matters and industrial pursuits as relate to the interests of agriculture, the secretary shall organize the following bureaus, namely:

First. The bureau of agricultural products, which shall include divisions of botany, entomology, and chemistry, and the chief of which bureau, who shall be a practical agriculturist, shall investigate the modes of farming in the several States and Territories, and shall report such practical information as shall tend to increase the profits of the farmer respecting the various methods; the crops most profitable in the several sections; the preferable varieties of seeds, vines, plants, and fruits; fertilizers; implements; buildings; and similar matters.

Mr. HUBBELL and Mr. MONEY rose to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk has not completed the reading of the section.

The Clerk continued the reading of the section, as follows:

Second. The bureau of animal industry, to be in charge of a competent veterinary surgeon, who shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States; their protection, growth, and use; the causes, prevention, or cure of contagious, communicable, or other diseases; and the kinds, races, or breeds best adapted to the several sections for profitable raising.

Third. The bureau of lands, the chief of which shall investigate and report upon the resources or capabilities of the public or other lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, or other industrial uses. And all powers and duties vested in the commission now known as the Geological Survey, together with all clerks, employés, and agents, and all instruments, records, books, papers, and so forth, are hereby transferred to the Department of Agriculture. And the secretary may, through said bureau, institute such investigations and collect such information, facts, and statistics relative to the mines and mining of the United States as may be deemed of value and importance.

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to inquire whether the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi is to the second paragraph?

Mr. MONEY. My amendment comes in after the first subdivision of the section relating to the bureau of agricultural products.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest the Clerk is reading the section. When the reading is completed the Chair will recognize gentlemen for amendments.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have an amendment to offer from the committee to the third paragraph of the section; but I wish to inquire of the Chair whether the Chair will entertain the amendments in the order of the paragraphs of the section?

Mr. KENNA. That would be much the better way.

Mr. MONEY. I would like to know where the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] comes in.

Mr. ANDERSON. In the clause relating to the third bureau. I wish to inquire whether the Chair prefers that amendments shall be offered in the order of the paragraphs as they stand in the section?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will entertain amendments first to the first paragraph, and then to the other paragraphs in their order.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the section, as follows:

Fourth. The bureau of statistics, the chief of which shall collect and report the agricultural statistics of the United States; and, in addition, all important information or statistics relating to industrial education and agricultural colleges; to labor and wages in this and other countries; to markets and prices; to modes and cost of transporting agricultural products and live stock to their final market; to the demand, supply, and prices in foreign markets; to the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, their sources of raw material, methods, markets, and prices; to such commercial or other conditions as may affect the market value of farm products or the interests of the industrial classes of the United States. And the secretary is hereby authorized to establish such divisions in this bureau, and to make such monthly or other reports as he shall deem most effective for the prompt dissemination of such reliable information respecting crops and domestic and foreign markets as will be of service to the farmers or other industrialists of the United States.

Mr. MONEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in after the first paragraph, relating to the bureau of agricultural products.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:

"That the secretary of the Department of Agriculture is hereby empowered and directed to establish in each State of the Union one or more experimental stations for the purpose of thoroughly testing valuable plants, seeds, fertilizers, and agricultural implements, with reference to soil and climate, and to appoint the necessary force for conducting them; and at least one of the experimental stations in each State shall be connected with an agricultural college, if there be such."

Mr. ANDERSON. I make the point of order on that amendment that it is the substance of a bill before the House.

Mr. MONEY. What bill is before the House with that in it? That is not before the House.

Mr. KENNA. A bill is pending before the House.

Mr. MONEY. It is not reported to the House.

Mr. KENNA. It is pending before a committee.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wish to inquire if we would not save time to have these paragraphs read separately and have amendments offered as if this was the first reading of the bill?

Mr. HAZELTON. I object to that. Amendments are already pending, and why suggest the offering of other amendments?

Mr. ANDERSON. I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. MONEY. I have offered this amendment to the bill because I believe it is of very great importance to the successful operation of the Department of Agriculture that this feature be incorporated in the bill. If there is any value whatever in the experiments being made by the Department of Agriculture in reference to seeds and plants, &c., it is in connection with the places where they must be grown. And to give those experiments a practical value they should be made upon the spot, so that the actual qualities of the soil and the conditions of the climate should be considered in making the experiment, thus testing its practical value. You make experiments here in Washington, and what are they worth to the people of the Lower Mississippi Valley, or to the people in the Rocky Mountain regions, or the people of New England, or other parts of the country? You make experiments here, and send a few seeds or plants to farmers all over the country, and they cultivate them in an irregular manner, and without the information necessary to their successful cultivation, without a knowledge of the proper ingredients of the soil best adapted to that cultivation.

My proposition is to attach to agricultural colleges in the several States respectively an officer, or two or three officers if necessary, who shall make experiments upon the spot, analyze the soil, ascertain what fertilizers are most profitable, with all the conditions necessary to carry out the experiments properly. When such an experiment shall have been made they will have found out what fertilizers are necessary for the soil, what machinery, &c., is best adapted for the cultivation of the seed or plant, what plants would give the greatest profits in that soil and climate to the agriculturist.

These several experimental stations, connected with the several agricultural colleges of the country, could be carried on with very small cost. The colleges would gladly furnish the offices, the appliances, and machinery for cultivation, and young men in search of active employment would watch those experiments and be able to ascertain from them the best method of cultivating plants and seeds all over the country, and such plants and seeds as would be suited to the region of the country in which they are grown. When you have done this you will have brought the benefits of these experiments home to every farmer in the country and the expense will be a matter of very small moment.

Mr. AIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. AIKEN. How do you propose to connect these stations with the department in Washington? By officers appointed by the secretary of the department here or appointed by the State officials?

Mr. MONEY. So far as that is concerned I am willing that they should be selected by the secretary of agriculture.

Mr. AIKEN. To be paid by whom?

Mr. MONEY. By the United States Government, of course; they would simply be adjuncts of the college.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the amendment of the gentleman contemplate more than one station in a State?

Mr. MONEY. Not necessarily.

Mr. ATKINS. Would it not be better to have one of these experimental stations in each county?

Mr. MONEY. I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. There are States that have great variety of climate.

Mr. TYLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the amendment in order to make a remark or two on the bill itself. The Committee on Agriculture allege that there is a general demand by the agriculturists of the country that the Department of Agriculture be raised to an Executive Department of the Government, its principal officer to be called the secretary of agriculture, and have a seat in the President's Cabinet. In recognition of that demand, if it exists, I desire to vote for a bill that would create such a department and make it effective. But to be effective it should be constructed with no unnecessary machinery.

In my judgment the committee's bill is too complex. It provides for four bureaus, a bureau of agricultural products, a bureau of animal industry, a bureau of lands, and a bureau of statistics, the chief officer of each to be appointed by the President. Now, I submit that there is no occasion for so many bureaus as the bill compels the secretary of this department to organize. To the first two I would not object, although the work delegated to them could as well if not better be performed by clerks appointed by the secretary, who would be under his immediate supervision and responsible to him for the discharge of their duties. But there seems to be no necessity for the last two, for the reason that the Government already has a bureau of statistics, and a statistician in the present Bureau of Agriculture, and for the further reason that the Land Office in the Interior Department can have its jurisdiction enlarged so as to collect all statistics and perform all duties that the bill proposes to confer on this bureau of lands.

The substitute bill submitted by the Committee on Civil Service Reform is simple and more direct in its provisions. It proposes two bureaus—one of animal industry and one of mining industry—their chiefs to be appointed by the secretary. As mining has become so great an interest in this country it seems proper that that industry should have a separate bureau. The other work of the department could better be performed by clerks under the direction of the secretary.

Mr. Speaker, one remark further. The farmers of this country are not an inferior class, whose society is desired only on election days, and who are denied their proper social and political position. The phrase "only a farmer," once employed as a term of reproach, long ago became obsolete. Farmers have learned that they are what they make themselves; that to successfully pursue their vocation requires brains, education, skill. In my section of the country, and I believe the same is true throughout the North, farmers, as a class, are intelligent, well-informed, and independent in respect of pecuniary means. Plenty sits smiling in every door. More than this, they are a controlling power in social and political affairs, and do not ask the Federal Government to elevate their condition, but they wish to elevate this department and enlarge its powers. Even in that section of the country where labor was for a century degraded, agriculturists have assumed the dignity that of right belongs to them. The statistics that have been exhibited here to show the enormous agricultural products of the country are proof positive that farmers have brought intelligence to their work, and that the products of the soil have returned to them wealth and influence.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MONEY it was not agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. On behalf of the Committee on Agriculture I offer the following amendment:

Strike out in section 3, in lines 25 to 30, the following: "And all powers and duties vested in the commission now known as the Geological Survey, together with all clerks, employés, and agents, and all instruments, records, books, papers, &c., are hereby transferred to the Department of Agriculture;" and insert the following:

"And the commission now known as the Geological Survey shall hereafter hold the same relation to the Department of Agriculture which it has heretofore held to the Department of the Interior."

Mr. PAGE. I rise for the purpose of opposing this amendment, which proposes, I understand, to transfer the Geological Survey from the Interior to the new Department of Agriculture. I believe that the Department of the Interior is the proper place for the Geological Survey. I should be glad to hear the gentleman from Kansas state if he can any reason why the control of this survey should be taken from the Interior Department and placed in the Department of Agriculture. All these matters of survey excepting the Coast Survey are by law under the control of the Interior Department, and I believe that they properly belong there; that it would be very unwise legislation to transfer them to the Department of Agriculture. This subject has no reference to agriculture. You might just as well, and indeed with much more propriety, take the Bureau of Education and transfer it to the Department of Agriculture. This Geological Survey ought to be left where it is, where it has been for so many years. The officers of the Interior Department are now familiar with the details of this matter. I hope that the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. DEERING. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether the amendment is divisible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules, the motion to strike out and insert is not divisible.

Mr. HAZELTON. I would like to understand from the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] whether this proposition to place the Geological Survey under the Agricultural Department was a part of the original bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAZELTON. For what reason should surveying be connected with the Department of Agriculture? Why not make the Surveyor-General's Department a branch of the Agricultural Department?

Mr. HUMPHREY. And the Geodetic Survey.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will answer the question. In my judgment there would be much more logic and pertinence in putting the survey of the whole country under the charge of the Agricultural Department than under the direction of the Interior Department. But that is neither here nor there. The public land bureau of the Interior Department has charge now of the public surveys. This bill proposes the establishment of a bureau of lands, which shall have for its object the investigation of the resources and capabilities of the public domain. There is already in existence this commission known as the Geological Survey, which, as I understand, has been maintained chiefly for the purpose of making scientific explorations.

It seems to the committee a perfectly proper and economical proposition that the officers in charge of this survey, in addition to performing their scientific work, should also give practical information in regard to the capabilities of the the public domain, its topography, its mineral resources, its adaptation for stock raising, &c. For this reason it seemed to the committee wise to provide for the transfer of this Geological Survey. But the amendment now offered from the committee makes simply a proposition that the Geological Survey shall hold to the Agricultural Department precisely the same relation which it now holds to the Interior Department. In other words, the autonomy of the Geological Survey is not affected.

Mr. HAZELTON. Does this cut off entirely the relation of the Geological Survey to the Interior Department?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. VALENTINE. And it is done at the request of Major Powell himself.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAGE. If this amendment be voted down, will it be in order to move to strike out in section 3 all after the word "uses," in the paragraph beginning with the word "third?"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it will be.

Mr. KENNA. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas by striking out the words "Interior Department" where they occur at the close of the amendment. On this motion I wish to be heard.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know when it will be in order to make a motion to strike out the clause on page 3, beginning after the word "uses," in line 25, and including all that refers to the Geological Survey?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already stated that such an amendment will be in order after the pending amendment shall have been acted on.

Mr. KENNA. I hope I may have the attention of the House for a moment or two, while I call attention to what seems to me to be the great difficulty in connection with the insertion in this bill of any proposition affecting the Geological Survey. I at first favored the transfer of that bureau; but I am now opposed to it, and for this reason: this survey has been intimately connected in its operations with the Smithsonian Institution.

I am reliably informed they have for years been co-operating with each other in pursuits in a great measure common to both of them. I believe the bill will be impaired by interference with the Geological Survey as heretofore organized.

I trust the House will consent to leave that matter where it is for an additional reason. We are all aware of the fact that the gentleman in charge of the Geological Survey of the country must, in order to preserve its efficiency, have control of the appointments in connection with that work. We are all aware of the further fact that to separate it from its present connection and attach it to a new department, organized on the theory of existing Executive Departments, must subject it to political vicissitudes and political influences which it is to the interest of a bureau, peculiarly constructed and engaged in peculiar work as this is, should not be done. I very much prefer the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas to the provision in the existing bill. I trust gentlemen will not be called on to insist on either, but that the Geological Survey should be permitted to remain where it is.

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to state in answer to what has been said——

Mr. KENNA. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HAZELTON. I renew it.

Mr. VALENTINE. I have the floor. This amendment now pending was written to please Major Powell.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the amendment?

Mr. VALENTINE. I object to it, if it takes me off the floor.

Mr. HAZELTON. By what right has the gentleman from Nebraska the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By the recognition of the Chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAZELTON. Ah! [Laughter.]

Mr. VALENTINE. I object to the withdrawal of the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia, as I desire to make a statement. The original bill when reported to the House was called to the attention of Major Powell, and he said he desired to be heard by the committee on the transfer of the commission to the Agricultural Department. I therefore invited Major Powell to come before the committee, and we would give him an opportunity to be heard. He did come before the committee, and explained the reasons why he did not want to go into a bureau of the Agricultural Department. I do not know that it is necessary to give those reasons to the House, perhaps he would not like me to do so, but they were sufficient to induce the committee to make a change. The committee, then, in presence of Major Powell, instructed the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] to draw an amendment placing the commission known as the Geological Survey in exactly the same relation to the Agricultural Department it now has to the Interior Department.

Mr. HAZELTON. What under heavens has the Geological Survey to do with agriculture? [Laughter.]

Mr. VALENTINE. The same that it has to do with the Interior Department. The Interior Department, according to the statement of Major Powell, now examines, audits, and allows the accounts of the Geological Survey. That is all it has to do. This amendment merely proposes to transfer that examination, auditing, and allowance of these accounts from the Interior Department to the Agricultural Department. There is nothing further in it. It does not enhance or help agriculture; and I do not believe we are at all anxious to have that labor imposed on the Agricultural Department. I am willing now, as in committee, that the whole paragraph should come out.

Mr. PAGE. I move to strike out the third part of section 3.

Mr. ANDERSON. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to submit my substitute.

Mr. ANDERSON. I suggest that instead of making the motion I did to strike out and insert we can test the sense of the House more quickly by striking out the language relating to the Geological Survey.

Mr. KENNA. That is what I rose for the purpose of asking.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is the amendment of the committee, and that will settle the question at once.

Mr. PAGE. Will it not be settled just as quickly by my amendment? In my judgment it would be the shortest way. I want to be heard on my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California can move his amendment at another time. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. KENNA. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. PAGE. But I have moved a substitute, and on that I desire to be heard. I move to strike out from line 22 to line 33.

Mr. ANDERSON. I hope that will not be done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California will withhold his amendment for the present. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, which will be read.

The amendment was again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I make a point of order upon the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I make the point of order that there is no such thing known in the statutes of the United States as the commission of the geological survey. In the original section the word commission is used, and the point of order is that there is no such commission. I send to the Clerk and ask him to read the statute.

Mr. HUMPHREY. And I make the point that if there is no such thing it does no harm to strike this out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HORR. I wish to ask a parliamentary question in reference to this proposition of the gentleman from Kansas. He proposes to strike out certain words and insert others. Can that motion be divided?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to strike out and insert is indivisible.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wish to inquire whether I cannot withdraw the motion in the form in which it was originally made and make the motion first to strike out; and if that is agreed to, follow it up by a motion to insert?

Mr. ATKINS took the floor.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I would like to inquire whether I have the floor. I rose to a point of order upon the amendment proposed to this bill, and I sent to the Clerk's desk the statutes.

Mr. ATKINS. I would like to ask if I have the floor or the gentleman from New York?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I had the floor, and the gentleman cannot take me off this floor while stating a point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I submit the parliamentary inquiry to the Speaker as to whether or not I have the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee was recognized.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Did not the Chair recognize me to state a point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has overruled the point of order.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I had not half stated the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS, (having been recognized.) If it will gratify the gentleman from New York, I now yield to him.

Mr. HAZELTON. The gentleman from New York had the floor and was undertaking to state his point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I had the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I was making a point of order and the Chair cut me off before I finished it. Now, if we are here to do this business we ought to do it properly. My point of order is that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is not in order.

Mr. ATKINS. I want to ask the gentleman from Kansas why not strike out all that relates to the Geological Survey?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have made that motion to strike out and then insert.

Mr. ATKINS. But this proposition to insert has reference to the Geological Survey, as I understand. Why have any proposition in the bill in regard to the Geological Survey? Why not let that survey remain as it is?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. ATKINS. Would it be in order to make a pro forma motion for the purpose of saying a word?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order of the House made on yesterday, debate on pro forma amendments cannot be allowed. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas, who moves to strikes out and insert.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have made that motion, but if it be in order and that is the desire of the House I have no objection to modifying it by moving to strike out first, and afterward insert.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire to modify the amendment?

Several MEMBERS. Let it stand as it is.

Mr. ANDERSON. Very well; I renew the original motion.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I would like to inquire, inasmuch as the gentleman from California has indicated a motion which he desires to submit to strike out the third section, whether that motion is regarded as pending; and, if it is regarded as pending, I desire to be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not now pending.

Mr. HAZELTON. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAZELTON. I understand the gentleman from Kansas has withdrawn his original motion.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have not withdrawn it; at the instance of several gentlemen I renew the original motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The original motion of the gentleman from Kansas is before the House.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Chair state what the question is?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the proposed amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. KENNA. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BERRY. I call for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not divisible. The gentleman from West Virginia will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to know if this proposition be accepted by a vote of the House, the existing clause in the pending bill stricken out and the proposed substitute inserted, whether a motion to strike out the whole will then be in order? In other words, I do not want to be cut off an opportunity of making that motion.

Mr. PAGE. The motion which I have submitted has not been entertained——

Mr. KENNA. I am referring to the motion of the gentleman from Kansas; whether the vote upon the pending proposition would affect a subsequent motion to strike out all that part of the bill which relates to the Geological Survey.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would not.

Mr. KENNA. I ask the question for the reason that I do not want any vote to be taken which would preclude that motion.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out these words: "the commission now known as."

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. There is no such thing as a geological commission. I have before me the statute which creates the office of a Director of the Geological Survey. It reads as follows:

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

For the salary of the Director of the Geological Survey, which office is hereby established, under the Interior Department, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, $6,000: Provided, That this officer shall have the direction of the Geological Survey, and the classification of the public lands, and examination of the geological structure, mineral resources, and products of the national domain.

This act was passed in 1878. That is all there is about it. There is no commission about it. The amendment, therefore, does not meet the case or accomplish what is intended, so long as the word "commission" is there. The Geological Survey is an independent institution, at the head of which is a director with a corps of experts under him. He appoints every one of them. Nobody can interfere with him or them. The survey would not be worth anything if he could not have absolute control over it. It is not a commission at all; and my friend from Kansas does not reach the point he desires to reach when he calls this a commission. His amendment therefore does not transfer the Geological Survey from the Interior Department, where it now is, to the Department of Agriculture. It leaves it still in the Interior Department. But it transfers a commission that has no existence from the Interior Department to that of Agriculture. The bill provides for the bureau of lands—

The chief of which shall investigate and report upon the resources or capabilities of the public or other lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, or other industrial uses.

This Geological Survey is itself a bureau of mines and mining. And this bill, if you pass it in its present shape, creates two such bureaus. You have got the Geological Survey, which is a bureau of mines and mining under the Department of the Interior, and you have got another bureau of mines and mining under the head of "bureau of lands," under the Agricultural Department. For in the last lines of the paragraph it is provided:

And the secretary may authorize said bureau to institute such investigations and collect such information, facts, and statistics relative to the mines and mining of the United States as may be deemed of value and importance.

That is exactly what Major Powell is doing. Therefore you have got a law to do the same thing twice over. You have two distinct offices and officers to do it and must do it twice. This double authority to do the same work will add unnecessarily $150,000 to the cost of the work. One bureau of mines and mining is better than two, and very much more economical.

Mr. HAZELTON. The gentleman from New York has made the point that this commission is not recognized by any existing law. It seems to me it makes no difference whether it is or not. The square proposition here before the American Congress is whether a bureau or a great interest connected with the Interior Department is now to be severed from that Department and put under the control of a new department not germane to it, and not having anything to do with it heretofore; whether this is to be done in the public interest now or anywhere.

It seems to me the strangest thing in the world that these gentlemen in fishing for bureaus found that the Geological Department in its present aspect had anything to do with the Agricultural Department of this Government. The Agricultural Department of this Government is created to promote the great interests of agriculture pure and simple in this great Republic. You might as well turn around and say we will take in the marines, we will take in the Signal Corps, we will take in the geodetic surveys, we will take in science in a thousand forms where it has nothing to do with practical agriculture—as well do that as reach out and take this Geological Bureau and put it in the Agricultural Department. To do so would imperil and destroy that bureau as it stands to-day. They want all these papers and books and archives transferred to the Agricultural Department. And yet my friend from Kansas says, and my friend from Nebraska says that all in the world they want now is that the Agricultural Department shall have the high and lofty privilege of auditing the accounts of the Geological Survey Bureau. They have brought it down to that. All they want now is to audit the accounts. What a blessing that would be to the American farmer!

Mr. ANDERSON. My smiling friend forgets this——

Mr. HAZELTON. Make this an agricultural department pure and simple and you can pass your bill, but you cannot pass it in any other way.

Mr. ANDERSON. We will see about that. But how can you farm without land? The public domain will be our future farms; and how are you to obtain information as to its capabilities except through the Geological Survey? If that is not its object, what is?

Mr. HAZELTON. But what have you to do with the Geodetic Survey?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not want to have anything to do with that.

Mr. HAZELTON. What have you to do with the Geological Survey more than you have to do with a bureau of theology, or the Fish Commission, or anything else which is entirely ungermane to this thing?

Mr. HUMPHREY rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I want to understand the position of the question. I understood the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] made a motion to strike out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN VOORHIS,] which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the words proposed to be inserted from line 25 to 30 strike out the words "the commission now known as."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. VAN VOORHIS, it was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. ANDERSON,] which the Clerk will read.

Mr. SCALES. Would it be in order now to move to strike out the paragraph, and would that motion have preference over the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas? After that amendment is acted on, can we move to strike out the paragraph?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the amendment can be acted on first to perfect the text, and that the motion to strike out will then be in order.

Mr. PAGE. I have had a motion to strike out pending for some time.

Mr. BUCKNER. Has not the gentleman from California proposed to strike out the whole paragraph?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California has not proposed such an amendment.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from California has asked when it would be in order to propose it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has stated that the first vote would be on a motion to strike out and insert; and the question would then be on a motion to strike out the whole paragraph.

Mr. LORD. I understand the Chair to decide that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas is indivisible. Is that so?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has so decided.

Mr. LORD. There was an intimation from the gentleman from Kansas that he was willing to submit his motion in two parts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas withdrew that.

Mr. LORD. If he will only do that the House can dispose of this at once.

Mr. VALENTINE. Would it not be in order now to move to amend by striking out?

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask that by unanimous consent I may modify my motion so as to move to strike out the language in the bill.

Mr. LORD. That is all I want.

Mr. ANDERSON. That will be followed immediately by the motion to insert.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANDERSON. I now move to amend the paragraph by striking out these words:

> And all powers and duties vested in the commission now known as the Geological Survey, together with all clerks, employés, and agents, and all instruments, records, books, papers, &c., are hereby transferred to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let us vote on striking out first.

Mr. CANNON. I move to amend so as to strike out the whole of that third paragraph.

Mr. VALENTINE. I make the point of order that that cannot be done. The gentleman from Kansas obtained unanimous consent from the House to divide his amendment so as to submit it to the House in two portions—one to strike out and the other to insert. That portion of his motion which is to strike out is now before the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. He had leave to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think this is fair play.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman asked unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment and to have a separate vote on the motion to strike out.

Mr. HAZELTON. Is not the substitute of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] in order. His motion was to strike out and insert.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognized the gentleman from California some time since.

Mr. PAGE. If I am recognized, then I would like to move an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ANDERSON. Allow me to make this suggestion: it is the practice of the House to first dispose of amendments coming from the committee reporting the bill. I have moved an amendment from the committee. After that has been disposed of, then the whole paragraph may be stricken out or any other motion may be made.

Mr. PAGE. I have no objection to that if the vote may be taken right away.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask that the House vote on my proposition to strike out, pure and simple. I think it is only fair play to give the committee a vote in that way.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let us take a vote now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. ANDERSON,] so as to strike out the entire third paragraph.

Mr. VALENTINE. And I make the point of order that that cannot be done, for the reason that we are now acting by unanimous consent on the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas, and on that alone. The gentleman from Kansas was asked by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LORD] to divide his proposition, and to let the question be first taken on the motion to strike out, and after that had been carried then the question to be taken on the motion to insert. Unanimous consent was given to that proposition, and the House is now acting under that order, and no gentleman can take advantage of it to offer an amendment.

Mr. LORD. It certainly seems to me that it was the understanding of the House that if the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] was willing to submit his proposition in two parts he should have the opportunity to do so, and unanimous consent was given for that purpose. Now, in all candor, the gentleman should be permitted to have a vote upon the two parts of his proposition if he desires to do so.

Mr. HAZELTON. He withdrew his amendment.

Mr. LORD. No; he obtained consent to submit it in two parts upon my suggestion.

Mr. ATKINS. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] if he will allow the vote to be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. ANDERSON,] and that motion shall be voted down, or even if it is agreed to, then the gentleman from Illinois can move to strike out the whole paragraph. Let us have a separate vote on the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas. I think it is but fair to the friends of the bill that that vote should be had.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is entitled to the floor on his amendment.

Mr. WILLITS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLITS. My point of order is, that it is proper to amend the paragraph before the motion to strike out the entire paragraph is in order. The proposition of the gentleman from Kansas is a proposition to amend the paragraph. After that has been done, then the motion to strike out the entire paragraph will be in order, and not before.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Both motions are to strike out; but the motion of the gentleman from Illinois is to strike out more than the other motion proposes.

Mr. WILLITS. I understand that. But the motion to strike out a portion of the paragraph is in the nature of perfecting the paragraph, which those friendly to the bill have a right to do before the motion to strike out the entire paragraph is in order. The promoters of the paragraph have the right to amend it, either by striking out a portion of it or in any other way, before the motion to strike out the whole paragraph will be in order.

Mr. HAWK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAWK. The gentleman from Kansas, having determined to divide his proposition, obtained consent of the House that the vote should be first taken upon the motion to strike out. When that motion shall have been acted upon the gentleman proposes, if the motion shall be agreed to, to follow it immediately with a motion to insert. Unanimous consent was given for that purpose. Now the question is whether it is not a part of that unanimous consent that the motion to insert shall follow immediately the motion to strike out a portion of the paragraph?

Mr. HAZELTON. What is the question?

Mr. HAWK. Did the Chair understand my point? I said that the gentleman from Kansas obtained unanimous consent to divide his motion, and to have a vote first taken upon that part of the motion which proposes to strike out a portion of the paragraph; that to be immediately followed by a motion to insert. Now the question is, are we not up to that point, operating under unanimous consent, and under the agreement must not the motion to insert follow the motion to strike out?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that unanimous consent was given to the gentleman from Kansas to withdraw the amendment proposed by him, which was a motion to strike out and insert. That gentleman now proposes to strike out certain words, which have been read. The gentleman from Illinois proposed to strike out the entire clause. The Chair is of opinion that the vote should first be taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Kansas to strike out a portion of the clause, after which the Chair will recognize the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the entire clause. The first question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas, to strike out the words which have been read.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. HAZELTON addressed the Chair.

Mr. ANDERSON. I understand that I have the floor. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HAZELTON. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am making a point of order now.

Mr. HAZELTON. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have already risen to a point of order.

Mr. HAZELTON. No, you rose to make a speech.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, my point of order is this——

Mr. HAZELTON. I say, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] rises to a point of order——

Mr. HAZELTON. I do.

Mr. ANDERSON. So had I risen to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin will state his point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. I rose to a point of order.

Mr. HAZELTON. I understand that I am recognized to state my point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, was I not recognized prior to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HAZELTON. I understand I am recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Kansas——

Mr. ANDERSON. To this point of order——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thereupon the gentleman from Wisconsin rose to a point of order, and the Chair asked him to state it. The Chair is waiting for him to do so.

Mr. HAZELTON. Now I have the floor to state my point of order?

A MEMBER. Go ahead.

Mr. HAZELTON. The Chair stated that upon the determination of the question upon which the vote has just been taken the next thing in order would be the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the whole clause, and that that motion would be entertained.

Mr. HAWK. Not until the clause is perfected.

Mr. HAZELTON. Now, I submit that that motion is in order, instead of the speech of the gentleman from Kansas. That is my point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. ANDERSON. I now ask for a vote upon the amendment which by general agreement was to be voted on. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

After "uses," in line 25, page 3, insert "and the commission now known as the Geological Survey shall hereafter hold the same relation to the department of agriculture which it has heretofore held to the Department of the Interior."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. I move to amend by striking out, on page 3 of the bill, the paragraph beginning with the word "third," on line 22, and ending with the word "importance," on line 33.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

Third. The bureau of lands, the chief of which shall investigate and report upon the resources or capabilities of the public or other lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, or other industrial uses. And all powers and duties vested in the commission now known as the Geological Survey, together with all clerks, employes, and agents, and all instruments, records, books, papers, &c., are hereby transferred to the department of agriculture. And the Secretary may, through said bureau, institute such investigations and collect such information, facts, and statistics relative to the mines and mining of the United States as may be deemed of value and importance.

Mr. PAGE. I desire merely to say that I represent a mining as well as an agricultural constituency, and I do not believe that the transfer of the supervision of mining industries to the Agricultural Department will be beneficial or acceptable to the country. In my view, everything relating to the subject of mining ought to be retained where it now is, under the control of the Interior Department. There is now in the Land Department a bureau of mines and mining, the officers of which are perfectly familiar with everything pertaining to the mining industries of the United States. All questions of contest pending between mining and agricultural applicants for any portion of the public domain are determined in the first instance by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, from whose decisions an appeal may be taken to the Secretary of the Interior.

The reports of some three or four hundred mineral surveyors are sent directly to the Interior Department. I think it would be wrong to interfere with this present arrangement, which is very satisfactory, or transfer any of its duties to another department. I certainly think it would be entirely a mistake to take it from the Interior Department and confine it to the Agricultural Department. One more word I desire to say, that I am in favor of a bill which provides for an agricultural bureau by itself. If the agriculturists of this country desire anything it is that their interests shall be segregated from all others. They do not want to mix them with a thousand other things. If the gentlemen upon this floor who are representing agricultural constituencies are in favor of benefiting, desire to do so, let them establish an agricultural bureau, pure and simple, and entirely unencumbered with any of these complications which this bill seeks to incorporate with it. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am heartily in sympathy with the remarks of the gentleman from California. I agree with him that we should have an agricultural department pure and simple. Do not seek to incorporate with it a technical department or a scientific branch of inquiry such as the mining industry of this country embodies. If you have the first bureau that is provided in this bill, that which establishes a bureau of examination touching agricultural lands, that, I think, is a good feature.

Again, I oppose the third clause of this bill for the reason that the mining bureau, as is well stated by the gentleman from California, is satisfactorily managed in the Interior Department. The geological survey and this mining bureau of the Interior Department exhaust the whole question, and when you put in a third mining bureau in the Agricultural Department you only make confusion and unnecessary expense. And I beg of this agricultural committee to give us an agricultural department that is a department of agriculture, and not seek to embarrass us who are wholly in favor of that by compelling us to vote in favor of something that will weaken that which we all want to guard most carefully, and which we believe necessary for the best interests of the class of our people that this bill seeks to reach. I hope this provision in reference to the surveys will be left exactly where it now is under the law; and let us have an agricultural department separate and alone.

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor and heartily concur with every word which has been said by both of the gentlemen who have just spoken; but I am not in favor of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from California. I may be permitted to say that nothing that has been said by either gentleman has anything whatever to do with the third clause of this bill—not the least. We do not propose to interfere with any jurisdiction now vested in the head of any other bureau or department in reference to mining. Nothing of the kind. But in order, as these gentlemen believe, to retain in the Interior Department a certain jurisdiction which is now there, they propose to strike out the whole of this section of the bill, destroying thereby a bureau of the Agricultural Department and one of the most important in this bill. And what is the object of it? Simply to save their mining interests.

Now, the provision they propose to strike out affects a bureau which takes charge of the arid region in which gentlemen from the Western country are all more or less interested. A part of the duty of that bureau or division is to examine into it with a view to ascertaining its adaptability to agriculture, with a view to determine whether water can be obtained and to make it susceptible to cultivation. That bureau also has charge of the important question of forestry, in reference to which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] has offered an amendment to perfect the text of the bill, which is now pending. And yet, with all of this, gentlemen propose to strike out the whole section because it interferes, as they claim, with the mining interests.

Now, if gentlemen desire to strike out that portion of the bill, which is discretionary with the Secretary, for it says he may do—what? Why, that he may institute such investigation and collect such facts and statistics relative to the land and mining interests as may be deemed of value and importance. They do the mining interests no injury, for this does not interfere with the surveys. It does not interfere with anything connected with the mining industries. All it does is this: we simply authorize him, if he deems it expedient, to ascertain the true status of the mines of the United States. The great agricultural interests of the country want information upon that question; and in this manner they will be able to obtain it, and not leave it to the stock brokers to determine whether the mines of the United States are valuable or not. We are only trying to protect all the great interests, as far as we can in this bill.

Mr. HAWK. Will the gentleman allow me to call attention to the first part of this clause, which provides that the chief of this bureau shall investigate and report upon the resources and capabilities of the public lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, and other industrial uses. It only refers to an investigation of these subjects, and will not interfere with any surveys which are now ordered by law under the Interior Department.

Mr. VALENTINE. Certainly not; it will not interfere with them in the least.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Where would appeals in such cases lie? Would they go to the agricultural department if you adopt this provision, or to the Department of the Interior, as at present?

Mr. BELFORD. I would like to have a moment upon this point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Your appeals would still go to the Interior Department, and not to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BELFORD. Am I recognized on this question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. BELFORD. I represent a people who are interested in this question, and I am their only representative on this floor——

Mr. PAGE. I hope the gentleman from Colorado will be allowed unanimous consent to be heard.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California, to strike out the third clause of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 73.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, and Mr. ANDERSON were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 80.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLITS. I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the third clause:

"The secretary may call upon the commission now known as the Geological Survey for information relating to waste and other lands; to geological formations which furnish gypsum and other natural fertilizers, and to all other matters peculiarly within the knowledge of said commission that may be of utility to agriculture; which information shall be annually furnished for the annual report of the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. WILLITS. The amendment explains itself. I suppose that the object the Committee on Agriculture had in the first place was to utilize whatever of knowledge this commission was supposed to have. There seemed to be some objection to transferring it from its present relations. And yet we ought to have somewhere the opportunity to obtain the information supposed to be particularly in the possession of that survey. It strikes me it would be an admirable thing to have a chapter in the agricultural report on this subject, leaving it discretionary with the secretary of agriculture and the superintendent of the survey as to what matters should go in. But I take it there is certain information there that would be found valuable if disseminated among the agriculturists of the country.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think there will be no objection to that amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. In behalf of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] who is not able to be present this afternoon, I offer the amendment of which he gave notice.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 3, after the word "importance," in line 33, add:

"There shall also be a division of forestry, the chief of which shall ascertain the annual amount of consumption, importation, and exportation of timber and other forest products, the probable supply for future wants, the means best adapted to the preservation and renewal of forests, the influence of forests upon climate, and kindred subjects."

Mr. VALENTINE. That is accepted on the part of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas will observe the section has been amended.

Mr. VALENTINE. Let the amendment come in after the last word of the section as amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can come in at the close of the amendment adopted on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WILLITS.]

The question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBELL. I desire to offer an amendment to section 3.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the first and fourth subdivisions of the section.

Mr. HUBBELL. My reason for offering that amendment, Mr. Speaker, is, as has been stated, when I had the floor to explain the difference between the bill introduced by myself and the committee's bill, that the duties enumerated in these two subdivisions of section 3 are already performed by certain bureaus and divisions in the Department of Agriculture. There are bureaus already organized for every duty which is prescribed in these two subdivisions, with one exception perhaps. The exception referred to will be found in the fourth subdivision of the section relating to the bureau of statistics. In that subdivision the chief of the bureau of statistics is authorized to collect "all important information or statistics relating to industrial education and agricultural colleges."

Now that fourth subdivision establishes in the Department of Agriculture another bureau, to wit, a bureau of agricultural education. Why should there be two bureaus of education in the Government? If it is decided there should be statistics and facts collected relating to agricultural colleges and schools, why should that not be done by the department of education? Why not enlarge its powers so that it may furnish information in regard to these institutions?

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the Agricultural Department as it is now organized, with that exception, is amply provided for in its present organization, I do not see the necessity of these two bureaus. The bureau of animal industry is a proper bureau and should remain in any bill that may be passed.

Mr. VALENTINE. Because the bill now under consideration, reported by the Committee on Agriculture, is not as imperfect as the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan, that gentleman is constantly attacking this bill, and if he can succeed in striking out the first and fourth subdivisions it will become as worthless as his own sub titute. I hope the House will vote down the amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. HUBBELL'S amendment, it was disagreed to.

Mr. MONEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the close of section 3 add the following:

"And he shall exchange his reports, bulletins, and other publications with the weekly journals of the Union."

Mr. ANDERSON. How many such papers are there?

Mr. MONEY. Not more than five or six thousand, I think.

I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the honorable gentleman in charge of the bill would have accepted this amendment. It would cost the department very little. This bill has four bureaus for the purpose of collecting information and statistics. It has no machinery adequate for the diffusion of this information when collected. Now, what is the use of expending money to collect statistics which are not to be disseminated? This proposition does not increase at all sensibly the expenses of the work of this particular bureau. It proposes simply to send one copy to each weekly paper in the United States in order that the people of the United States may know the facts and statistics which are collected at so much expense for their benefit.

Mr. REAGAN. I would ask the gentleman what is the number of these papers?

Mr. MONEY. I do not know precisely. I understand the number is about five or six thousand. But if there were ten thousand or fifty thousand papers what I propose would be so much the more valuable, because it would insure a wide circulation for these facts and statistics. This information, if collected at all, is collected for the benefit of the people of the United States, and it ought to be made as free and common to them as the air they breathe. Unless this is done these reports will be of advantage to nobody except the sharpers and speculators who get up corners on your grain, cotton, and pork. While they get the whole value of any rise there may be in the market, the farmer, for whose benefit it is said that all this machinery is put in motion to collect these statistics, is to be kept absolutely in the dark. It was not till the 10th of December we learned that the cotton crop was a million of bales short, though that information could have been furnished by the 10th of October. The result was that the speculators obtained all the margin of profit. There is not a man on this floor to-day who can tell within thirty millions of bushels the amount of wheat on hand. If my amendment should be adopted these statistics would be sent abroad in the reports, furnished to the weekly newspapers throughout the country, and the people themselves would be put in possession of the information.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to call the attention of my friend from Mississippi to the language of the latter part of this fourth clause:

And the secretary is hereby authorized * * * to make such monthly or other reports as he shall deem most effective for the prompt dissemination of such reliable information respecting crops and domestic and foreign markets as will be of service to the farmers or other industrialists of the United States.

And then I desire to say that if this bill shall become a law and this machinery be put at work, constant reports will be made.

Mr. MONEY. To whom?

Mr. ANDERSON. Monthly and weekly reports, so far as that is concerned, will be made, and it seems to me that it would be far better in an organic law to leave the secretary a discretion as to how he shall disseminate this information than to put in the law a mandatory provision that he shall send his reports to every one of several thousand papers in the country.

Mr. MONEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if the secretary to-day uses this vast machinery for bringing the information he collects to the knowledge of the people of the United States? Is there anything in this bill mandatory upon him to put this information in circulation?

Mr. ANDERSON. He never has had this machinery before.

Mr. MONEY. He has collected information which he has put into an annual report. And if gentlemen will go down into the folding-room they will find that the report made two years ago is just coming in for distribution. In the mean time the sharpers and speculators have swept away all the margins of profits from the men who produced the articles. I was in hopes that the gentleman in charge of this bill, seeing the obvious advantage that would accrue to the people of the United States at a very small expense, would accept the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. We cannot accept an amendment involving an indefinite expenditure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time for debate has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY.]

Mr. MONEY. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, no.

Mr. MONEY. Yes, I will. You can vote it down if you do not want it.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being but 11 in the affirmative.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG. I move to strike out the fourth paragraph of section 3, and insert in lieu thereof that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the secretary of said department of agriculture to organize therein a bureau of manufactures and mechanics, the duties of which shall be the collection of and diffusion, through reports made not less often than once in each year, of information, to be as far as possible in the shape of statistics of the manufacturing and mechanical industries of the United States. That it shall be the special duty of the bureau to secure information and report as to the condition of the producing classes as represented by wage-workers, especially as to their wages and cost of living as compared with the value of their productions; and it shall further be the duty of the bureau to investigate as to and report on the moral, social, educational, and sanitary condition of mechanics and wage-laborers, and as to the causes which may operate injuriously upon these conditions; and so far as is possible secure statistics of the leading manufactures of the several States, amount of capital invested, value of raw material used per year, wages paid, value of product, and the number of persons employed, dividing them according to age and sex.

That the bureau shall also secure information and statistics as to the location of the iron-producing lands of the United States, their process of development, the kind and quality of such minerals, the number of persons employed in securing such minerals for use, the wages paid them, the average number of days employed in each year, the quantities of such minerals produced annually, and the value thereof. That a general report shall be made by the bureau on or before the 1st day of February in each year to the secretary of agriculture and the Congress of the United States and it shall make special reports whenever called upon by either House of Congress.

Mr. VALENTINE. I think that amendment is subject to the point of order that there is now pending before this House a bill of which that is the substance.

Mr. YOUNG. I beg the gentleman's pardon; there is no such bill pending.

Mr. VALENTINE. It is very nearly like it. Besides, it is not germane to this portion of the bill.

Mr. YOUNG. There is no man on this floor who has a higher regard for the agricultural interests of this country than I have. There is no man on this floor who will vote more money for the purpose of lifting up the Department of Agriculture than I will. There is no man who will vote money more freely for the purpose of developing all the sciences that lead to the advancement and encouragement of agriculture.

If it is proposed to exalt the present Department of Agriculture into a Cabinet department, with a voice in the councils of the President, (to which I do not at present assent,) then let us exalt the office by giving it duties to perform that will be beneficial and useful to the people.

I hold that there are other interests, not paramount to, but I think it will be conceded that there are other interests almost equal to the agricultural interest that have not been taken care of. There are times when the mechanic and the manufacturer disagree; times when they come in conflict with each other; times when there are disruptions of society, known as strikes. Those strikes certainly result from ignorance of statistical information; the ignorance of the mechanic as to the operations of the capital which gives him employment; ignorance resulting from the want of statistics, which my amendment proposes to furnish.

There are other reasons which I might enumerate, if I had the time, to show why this is an important subject and one that ought to be taken charge of by some Department, a subject which has not yet been recognized. The Bureau of Statistics, which we now have does not give us anything looking to definite information as to the prices of labor all over the country.

The mechanic, for instance the tailor or the shoemaker, is paid a different rate of wages in Philadelphia from that paid in Cincinnati. The puddler is paid a different rate of wages in Pittsburgh from that paid in Cincinnati. The capital invested farthest away from the source of the raw material has to obtain a higher rate of interest for the investment than a plant of the same amount of capital where the raw material is obtained.

Now, if these statistics were furnished to the mechanics and laborers who depend upon the investment of large amounts of capital, if they could be furnished with statistics showing from time to time what wages are being paid in different parts of the country, what interest is being derived by capital on the amount of money invested, they would never strike, because all men are sensible of their own best interests when they know what they are. They would say, "we are getting sufficient wages; all that our employer can spare in view of the capital he has invested and the price he obtains for the product of our labor."

This amendment may be objected to as not being germane to the subject of agriculture. I submit that it is germane. The agriculturist needs to-day all the information that can be furnished to him—everything that may throw light upon the relations between labor and capital.

Mr. VALENTINE. I will not insist on my point of order, although I believe it well taken. The object of the gentleman's amendment is to strike out a very important paragraph of this bill and insert as a substitute what he submits. But if the bill as reported becomes a law everything that the gentleman desires will be provided for in the fourth division of section 3, besides a great deal which his amendment does not contemplate. That paragraph provides for the collection of information touching "the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, their sources of raw material, methods, markets, and prices." Another portion of the paragraph provides for the collection of statistics in regard to "labor and wages in this and other countries."

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman point out any part of the paragraph which I move to strike out that requires the statistician to furnish to the chief of any department the statistics called for in my amendment?

Mr. VALENTINE. I have just read the provision.

Mr. YOUNG. Can the gentleman say that the first, second, and third divisions of the third section of his bill do not embrace all that the fourth division provides for?

Mr. VALENTINE. They do not.

Mr. YOUNG. In my view the fourth division simply reiterates what is already covered by the first, second, and third divisions.

Mr. VALENTINE. Oh, no; the fourth paragraph is, I think, very distinct.

Mr. HAWK. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee [Mr. VALENTINE] yields me a portion of his time. I shall not undertake to enter into a discussion of that portion of the section proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. YOUNG,] and which is now under consideration. I prefer to consume the time allotted to me in a few general statements with reference to the provisions of this bill.

Certain gentlemen who have preceded me appear to be exceedingly disturbed with the idea that the department of agriculture to be erected by this bill is to be transformed into a political machine. The same objection may be urged against any other department of this Government. I beg gentlemen to possess their souls in peace concerning so great a calamity. There is no cause for alarm in this particular instance. Indeed, should such a condition prevail, I can scarcely discern any reason in it to cause this House to refuse to place this material interest in a position where it justly and properly belongs.

Sir, when the agricultural interests of the country, which, as has been stated in this debate, have scarcely heretofore had any recognition whatever by Congress, come here asking the passage of what may be termed a reasonable bill, is it fair dealing, is it consistent with our oft-expressed regard for those interests, to refuse to accede to their just and fair demands? I do not desire to be understood as stating that this bill is perfect in every particular, but it is a measure which as the years go by can and will be perfected in such a way as very materially to benefit the agricultural interests of this country.

If, as has often been stated in this debate, our agricultural production is the chief basis of our wealth and prosperity, and that from the real wealth produced by the toiling millions engaged in these pursuits we must expect succor in times of emergency in our commercial transactions and in periods of business depression, why should we refuse to erect this bureau of the Interior Department into a department by itself, having for its objects and aims the elevation of this calling which is so universally acknowledged to be the source of our wealth and prosperity?

It has been argued that the erection of the Agricultural Bureau into an executive department of the Government, to be presided over by a Cabinet officer who shall be denominated a secretary of agriculture, will increase the expense to the taxpayers. This should, however, affect the passage of the bill only in so far as there may be benefits derived commensurate with the expenditure. It is believed that this bill is so framed that there is no doubt but that this new department, with the organization of the several bureaus as contemplated, cannot fail to result in the dissemination of such information as must materially aid in an increase of intelligence in the application of labor and machinery, as well as making it a reliable source of information upon the subjects of the amount and prices of agricultural products at home and abroad in such manner as to materially increase the profits of the farmer. It not only gives this avocation a standing at home, but abroad as well; and any encouragement we may give in the direction of dignifying labor must redound to our benefit. It will tend to prominently and honorably bring before the nations of the world the fact that the United States is so fully aware of the importance of this great industry that it is placed in a conspicuous position in the affairs of government. And in questions affecting our standing in the markets of the world, such as reports concerning the disease of our domestic animals for export, it must ever be an authority greatly exceeding that of a mere bureau of a department.

Had such a department been in existence two years ago, at the time of the scare in Europe caused by the report that great quantities of diseased pork would be shipped from this country to European markets, vast sums of money would have been saved in this one instance alone to our farmers. Mr. Speaker, I can see no good reason why this bill should not become a law. I believe it to be sufficiently broad to cover all material subjects connected with agriculture, and at the same time sufficiently guarded to protect from any undue delegation of power to this new department. I shall vote for the bill because I believe it to be a move in advance and in the interests of my agricultural constituency.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. YOUNG, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HASELTINE. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "prices," in line 31 of section 3, the following:

To the railroad system of the country and the absolute cost of constructing and operating the same, to freights and tariffs upon the principal lines of transportation, and to any discrimination which may be made upon the same, for or against certain localities.

I understand this amendment to be acceptable to the committee, and I am willing to submit the question without any argument.

Mr. VALENTINE. The provision of this amendment is already fully covered by the bill as well as by the section of existing law relative to the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department.

Mr. KENNA. I hope that this amendment will not be insisted upon.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the secretary of agriculture shall hereafter receive the same salary as is paid to the Secretary of each of the Executive Departments; the salary of the assistant secretary of agriculture shall be the same as that paid to the Assistant Secretary of the Department of the Interior; and the salary of a chief of bureau shall be the same as that paid to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

SEC. 5. That all laws and parts of laws relating to the Department of Agriculture now in existence, as far as the same are applicable and not in conflict with this act, and only so far, are continued in full force and effect.

Mr. KENNA. I now offer for the bill as matured the substitute of which I have already given notice. I do not wish to debate it, but will merely state before it is read that the portion of the substitute relating to agriculture embraces the bill which the House has just matured, with only such formal changes as to adapt it to the general scope of the substitute.

Mr. VALENTINE. Let the Clerk read only those portions of the substitute which are not included in the bill of the committee.

Mr. HUBBELL. Let the whole be read.

The substitute of Mr. KENNA was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:

That there shall be at the seat of Government an executive department to be known as the department of industries, and a secretary of industries, who shall be the head thereof.

SEC. 2. That there shall be in the department of industries a division of agriculture, and to superintend said division a commissioner of agriculture, who shall be a practical agriculturist, and who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall be entitled to receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of collecting and disseminating all important and useful information concerning agriculture, and also concerning such scientific matters and industrial pursuits as relate to the interests of agriculture, the secretary of industries shall organize the following bureaus in the division of agriculture, namely:

First. The bureau of agricultural products, which shall include divisions of botany, entomology, and chemistry, and the chief of which bureau, who shall be a practical agriculturist, shall investigate the modes of farming in the several States and Territories, and shall report such practical information as shall tend to increase the profits of the farmer respecting the various methods; the crops most profitable in the several sections; the preferable varieties of seeds, vines, plants, and fruits; fertilizers; implements; buildings; and similar matters.

Second. The bureau of animal industry, to be in charge of a competent veterinary surgeon, who shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States; their protection, growth, and use; the causes, prevention, or cure of contagious, communicable, or other diseases; and the kinds, races, or breeds best adapted to the several sections for profitable raising.

Third. The bureau of lands, the chief of which shall investigate and report upon the resources or capabilities of the public or other lands for farming, stock-raising, timber, manufacturing, mining, or other industrial uses. And all powers and duties vested in the commission now known as the Geological Survey, together with all clerks, employés, and agents, and all instruments, records, books, papers, &c., are hereby transferred to the Department of Industries. And the Secretary of Industries shall institute such investigations and collect and report such information, facts, and statistics relative to the mines and mining of the United States, and facilities for their ventilation and general operation, as may be deemed of value and importance.

SEC. 4. That in addition to the duties imposed by chapter 10, title 7, of the Revised Statutes, the secretary of industries shall cause to be collected and report the agricultural statistics of the United States; and, in addition, all important information or statistics relating to industrial education and agricultural colleges; to labor and demands and prices therefor in this and other countries; to markets and prices; to modes and cost of transporting agricultural products and live stock to their final market; to the demand, supply, and prices in foreign markets; to the location, number, and products of manufacturing establishments of whatever sort, their sources of raw material, methods, markets, cost of transportation, and prices; to such commercial or other conditions as may affect the market value of farm products or the interests of the industrial classes of the United States. And the secretary is hereby authorized to establish such divisions in this bureau, and to make such monthly or other reports, as he shall deem most effective for the prompt dissemination of such reliable information respecting crops and domestic and foreign markets as will be of service to the farmers, miners, mechanics, laborers, and other industrialists of the United States.

SEC. 5. That there shall be in the department of industries a division of commerce, and to superintend said division a commissioner of commerce, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 6. That all divisions and subdivisions, bureaus or parts thereof, heretofore attaching to the Treasury Department by virtue of the provisions of chapter 10, of title 7, of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Bureau of Statistics, which shall hereafter be known as the bureau of external commerce; title 48, relating to commerce and navigation; title 49, relating to the regulation of vessels in foreign commerce; title 50, relating to the regulation of vessels in domestic commerce; title 52, relating to the regulation of steam-vessels; title 56, relating to the Coast Survey; title 55 relating to lights and buoys; sections 4801, 4802, 4803, 4804, 4805, 4806, of chapter 1, title 59, relating to hospital relief for seamen; and chapter 265 of the acts of the Forty-fifth Congress, second session, relating to the Life-Saving Service, or by virtue of any law amendatory of said several provisions, or regulations in pursuance thereof, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be parts of the division of commerce in the department of industries; and the secretary of industries shall establish in said division of commerce a bureau of internal commerce, to be organized and governed as other bureaus in said division.

SEC. 7. That all duties devolving upon the Secretary of the Treasury by virtue of the several provisions mentioned in the preceding section shall, from and after the passage of this act, be performed by the secretary of industries. The authority conferred and the duties imposed by said several provisions upon the Register of the Treasury shall, from and after the passage of this act, be exercised and discharged by the commissioner of commerce. All bonds authorized by any of the provisions aforesaid to be made payable to the Register of the Treasury shall, from and after the passage of this act, be made payable to the commissioner of commerce.

SEC. 8. That section 158, title 4, of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the words: "Eighth. The department of industries."

SEC. 9. That this act shall not be construed to interfere with the present organization of the various departments, divisions, subdivisions, and bureaus embraced herein, except with reference to the transfer thereof to the department of industries, subject to the general provisions of law relating to regulations in the various Departments of the Government and appointments to office therein.

SEC. 10. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from West Virginia, which has just been read.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 83.

Mr. KENNA. This is an important matter, and I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the gentleman from Kansas now allow us to adjourn, as it is late.

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope the House will not adjourn.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let us remain here until this bill has been passed.

Mr. RANDALL. The call of the yeas and nays will take half an hour, and it is now too late to go on with it. I hope we will be permitted to adjourn, and this will come up as the first business in the morning.

Mr. VALENTINE. I noticed the gentleman from Pennsylvania voted for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House do now adjourn, as it is long past the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let us remain here, and we can dispose of this bill in a short time.

Mr. KENNA. I understand the yeas and nays are ordered on my substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are. The question now is on the motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 73.

Mr. VALENTINE. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, yes!

Several MEMBERS. Do not filibuster.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. AIKEN. As the House has determined to take the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn as well as on the substitute, I ask whether by agreement we cannot take them at once on the passage of the bill and save time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no desire to delay action on this bill. The vote is only postponed till the morning if we adjourn now.

Mr. ANDERSON. Call the roll.

The vote was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 89, nays 99, not voting 103; as follows:

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports from Major Amos Stickney, Corps of Engineers, of examinations and surveys of Atchafalaya River and of Bayous Grand Caillou and Little Caillou, Louisiana, made in compliance with requirements in the river and harbor act of June 14, 1880; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN ANTIQUITIES.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I present a brief but very interesting petition from the members of the New England Historic Genealogical Society, asking legislation to protect some extremely interesting antiquities in New Mexico and Arizona. Under the rule it would be my duty to make a brief statement of the contents of the petition, I think, however, that can be better done by having it read. It is very short, and I ask the attention of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. PLUMB] to the petition.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to hear it read.

Mr. HOAR. My request is to have the petition read, and I ask the honorable Senator to do me the favor to listen to it.

The Acting Secretary read the petition, as follows:

HISTORIC GENEALOGICAL SOCIETY,
SOCIETY HOUSE, (18 Somerset street,)
Boston, Massachusetts, May 8, 1882.

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

Your memorialists, the members of the New England Historic Genealogical Society, would respectfully represent:

That there are in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona twenty-six towns of the Pueblos Indians, so called, in all containing about ten thousand inhabitants; that the number of their towns was once very much greater; that these remaining are the remnants of very ancient races in North America, whose origin and history lie yet unknown in their decayed and decaying antiquities; that many of their towns have been abandoned by the decay and extinction of their inhabitants; that many of their relics have already perished and so made the study of American ethnology vastly more difficult; that the question of the origin of those Pueblos and the age of their decayed cities, and the use of some of their buildings, now magnificent ruins, constitute one of the leading and most interesting problems of the antiquary and historian of the present age; that relic-hunters have carried away, and scattered wide through America and Europe the remains of these extinct towns, thus making their historic study still more difficult, and, in some particulars, nearly impossible; that these extinct towns, the only monuments or interpreters of these mysterious races, are now daily plundered and destroyed in a most vandal way; that, for illustration, the ancient Spanish cathedral of Pecos, a building older than any now standing anywhere within the thirteen original States, and built two years before the founding of Boston, the metropolis of New England, is being despoiled by the robbery of its graves, while its timbers are used for campfires, sold to relic-hunters, and even used in the construction of stables.

Your memorialists therefore pray your honorable body that at least some of these extinct cities or pueblos, carefully selected, with the land reservations attached and dating mostly from the Spanish crown, of the year 1680, may be withheld from public sale and their antiquities and ruins be preserved, as they furnish invaluable data for the ethnological studies now engaging the attention of our most learned scientific, antiquarian, and historical students.

MARSHALL P. WILDER,
President of the New England Historic Genealogical Society.
EDMUND F. SLAFTER,
Corresponding Secretary of the New England Historic Genealogical Society.

Mr. HOAR. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Public Lands. I wish to say for the information of that committee that not only this society, which contains a great many eminent scholars interested in these researches, but some other societies in the New England States, as well as in the Northwest and other parts of the country, are paying now great attention to this matter of ethnology. The American Antiquarian Society, with whose original founding Alexander Von Humboldt took a very large interest, has made some very important contributions to the ethnological history of this country. Some of those gentlemen have expended very large sums in making researches in Yucatan and Mexico and in our Territories of the West. By reserving these lands from public sale, or by some legislation which will protect these antiquities from ruthless destruction, the Government can at a very slight cost give much aid to their researches.

Mr. PLUMB. Before the reference is made, I desire to say that I know something of this subject through my acquaintance in the country where these ruins are located. I have seen the Pecos church to which reference has been made. Probably the statement in regard to its antiquity is correct, and I have no doubt the further statement that it is going into ruin and that its timbers are being used up for various domestic purposes is also correct. It is to be said, however, that that country contains a great many villages at which these antiquities can be had, where they exist as fully as they do in these abandoned villages, where the tribes owning the lands now occupy the village.

It would be, therefore, physically impossible for the Government to furnish the protection which is sought by the petitioners to any very considerable extent, unless a guard was to be stationed at each place charged with the duty of warning off intruders. It seems to me the better way would be for the societies having an interest in this matter to avail themselves of the license which now exists of going to the different localities and gathering up the relics, as I know has been done. A party, instituted in the city of Philadelphia, I think, went out last year and got some very significant relics, and various other expeditions have been sent out from Yale College, I think, for a similar purpose, no doubt with a similar result.

I do not speak of this as specially detracting from the purpose of the petitioners, or as in any way anticipating what the committee may do, or what I myself may think upon reflection; I speak of this merely as showing the difficulties in the way. I have no doubt that there are to-day many curiosities under the control of tribes who have a right to the land upon which their towns are located just as sacred under the law as that of any man to his property, and which, by reason of their occupancy, will be preserved, at least to a sufficient extent to accomplish all the purposes the petitioners have in view.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, presented a petition of citizens of Stonewall district, Wayne County, West Virginia, praying that Congress take such steps as in their wisdom may be best to promote the interests of education; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of the John Bell Post, No. 112, of Washington, Ohio, in favor of the passage of a bill providing for an increase of pensions to soldiers who have lost one arm, one hand, one foot, or one leg, or suffered an equivalent disability; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the faculty of Hiram College, Hiram, Ohio, praying for the passage of a bill for the distribution of national aid to education on the basis of illiteracy; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BLAIR presented the petition of Rev. E. P. Merrifield and 60 other citizens, of the Baptist Society, of Lyme, New Hampshire, praying for national aid to the schools for the native people in Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

THOMAS J. WHARTON.

Mr. GEORGE. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 869) for the relief of Thomas J. Wharton, have had the same under consideration and direct me to submit a report in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill at this time. The Senator from Mississippi in a word can state what the bill is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It appropriates $250 for the benefit of Thomas J. Wharton, of Jackson, Mississippi, as compensation for professional services rendered by him in the southern district of Mississippi, under appointment of the then district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Mississippi, in accordance with the statute in such case made and provided.

Mr. GEORGE. Is any explanation desired?

Mr. INGALLS. The report had better be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the report, as follows:

The facts on which this claim is founded will be found in the following report made in the House of Representatives:

"'The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 869) for the relief of Thomas J. Wharton, have considered the same, and find that the report made thereon by the Committee on Claims of the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress to the House of Representatives was correct, and adopt the same, which is as follows:

"'The bill proposes to pay to the claimant the sum of $250, for professional services rendered the Government in the southern district of Mississippi.

"'On the 16th day of June, 1874, Felix Brannigan, United States attorney for the southern district of Mississippi, purporting to act "by virtue of the authority vested" in him by the fourteenth section of the act of August 16, 1856, appointed the claimant "to attend to such business as may appertain to the duties of my office during my absence from the district in the prosecution of the cases of the United States vs. H. B. McClure and J. W. Robbins, now pending before C. L. C. Cass, United States commissioner in this district."

"'The claimant is a lawyer of ability and attended faithfully to the duties designated, and presented his account and asked to have it allowed. On the 20th day of November, 1875, being a day in court, Hon. R. A. Hill, judge of the district court, presiding, after argument it was "considered by the court that the appointment of said T. J. Wharton * * * was fully authorized by section 14, act of Congress August 16, 1856, (11 Stat., 51;) * * * that it was the duty of the district attorney thereunder to make said appointment, and the said section was not repealed by any provision of the act to establish the Department of Justice, (16 Stat., 162;) and it being admitted by W. W. Dedrick, United States attorney, and the court being satisfied that the sum of $250 charged by said Wharton for legal services rendered for the United States under said letter of appointment in the account attached to said motion is just and moderate, the court doth hereby allow, approve, and tax said account, and recommend that the same be paid as authorized by the provisions of section 838, Revised Statutes."

"'The Treasury Department refused to pay the account, because—

"'First. Since the passage of the act creating the Department of Justice the district attorney had no authority to employ counsel to attend to his duties.

"'Second. Because the substitution was not sanctioned by the Secretary of the Interior; and "'Third. The district attorney himself would not have been allowed such a bill had he performed the service himself.

"'The committee are of opinion that the district attorney misconceived his power, and that he had no authority to make the appointment, and that the judge erred in his ruling; but it is conceded that the services were rendered, and they were rendered under the assurance that they would be paid for, and that they were worth the sum claimed. We are of opinion that the claimant is entitled to the sum claimed upon a quantum meruit, and recommend that the bill do pass.'"

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GEORGE. The Committee on Claims have had under consideration sundry bills in relation to the judicial ascertainment of claims against the Government of the United States, and have directed me to report adversely as to all the bills, and to report an original bill from the committee and recommend its passage.

The bill (S. No. 1858) to provide for the investigation and settlement of claims against the United States which in justice and good conscience ought to be paid by them was read twice by its title.

The bills adversely reported were indefinitely postponed, as follows:

A bill (S. No. 1297) conferring upon the Court of Claims jurisdiction to hear and determine all claims against the Government of the United States;

A bill (S. No. 1449) to provide for the investigation and settlement of claims against the United States which in justice and good conscience ought to be paid by them; and

A bill (S. No. 1586) for the judicial ascertainment of the facts in cases of private claims, and for other purposes.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Mary Dove, colored, of Utica, New York, praying compensation for the use and occupancy of her property in Nashville, Tennessee, by United States forces during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 707) for the relief of Mrs. Anastasia E. Fish, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GROVER. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 400) authorizing full pay to Lieutenant Frederick Schwatka, United States Army, while on leave to serve in command of the Franklin search expedition in the Arctic, to report it with amendments. I shall submit a report hereafter.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of Josephine B. Bruce and others, asking authority of Congress to sell the lot upon which is located the Home of the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children, and for $20,000 to erect a new building on a more eligible site, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1859) making an appropriation to erect a new building for the use of the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

JOHN SILSBY AND OTHERS.

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1689) for the relief of John Silsby and others, purchasers of the "Weaver tract" lot of land in the city of Selma, State of Alabama, have directed me to report it without amendment. I ask the Senate for the present consideration of the bill. I think the Senate will not refuse to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Acting Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MORGAN. A letter of the Attorney-General, accompanying the report of the committee, recommends the confirmation of the title.

Mr. HOAR. Is the bill upon the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a bill just reported.

Mr. HOAR. Why should not the bill go on the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama requested its present consideration. The Chair asked the Senate if there was any objection to its consideration. The bill has been read.

Mr. INGALLS. Bills are always read for information.

Mr. HOAR. It was read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly; if there is objection the bill cannot be considered to-day.

Mr. HOAR. Why should not the bill go on the Calendar?

Mr. MORGAN. It is a bill to quiet the title to a tract of land in Selma, Alabama, which has been in dispute or litigation with the Government of the United States now for some three or four years, and upon which no improvement can be made in consequence of that fact. The district attorney thought it was his duty to bring suit to try the title in favor of the Government of the United States, but upon the facts being presented to the Attorney-General he ordered the suit to be dismissed, being satisfied that the purchasers had not only bought in good faith and under the decree of the court but had paid the money. The object of the bill is merely to quiet the title. It will take but a moment to consider it. The Attorney-General states the facts and recommends the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. Let the report and letter be printed and the bill go over, so that we can see them in print. The Senator can call it up after they are printed.

Mr. MORGAN. I give notice that to-morrow morning I shall ask the Senate, before it proceeds to the consideration of the Calendar under the Anthony rule, to take up the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report and letter will be printed, and the bill goes over.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1860) to attach the county of Hardeman, in the State of Tennessee, to the eastern division of the western district of Tennessee; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the bill and the accompanying letter from the bar of Hardeman County on the subject of the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COKE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1861) for the relief of A. C. Larkin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (by request,) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. Mr. CONGER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1863) to place the customs district of Alexandria on the same list with Georgetown, District of Columbia, and Cherrystone, Virginia, and other districts of that class; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VEST asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1864) donating to the city of Saint Louis, Missouri, a certain strip of land for street purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALDRICH asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 62) for the relief of Henry A. Greene; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ASSAY OFFICE AT DEADWOOD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" the morning hour is declared closed.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask now to take up out of its order a bill reported from the Committee on Finance, establishing an assay office at Deadwood, Dakota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to taking up the bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1604) to establish an assay office at Deadwood, in the Territory of Dakota. It establishes an assay office at Deadwood and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be constructed a suitable building at Deadwood for the purposes, and provide the same with the necessary fixtures and apparatus, at a cost not exceeding $50,000.

Mr. INGALLS. It appears to me that that is rather an extravagant sum to appropriate for this purpose in that infant Territory. The facilities already for assaying are ample in the immediate neighborhood, and I doubt the wisdom or the policy or the propriety of distributing these offices over different portions of the country to be followed, as they inevitably are, by efforts for establishing mints. I should like to hear from the Senator from Vermont some statistics of the production of that Territory which would seem to warrant in his judgment this, which appears to me an extravagant expenditure.

Mr. MORRILL. A very large amount of ore is produced at Deadwood, and the quantity is constantly increasing. The amount is now larger I believe than is produced at any other place, perhaps California excepted, and it has to be transported to Omaha or to New York——

Mr. INGALLS. Or Denver.

Mr. MORRILL. Or Denver.

Mr. INGALLS. And there are ample facilities by rail, as I understand, for that transportation.

Mr. MORRILL. But it amounts to a considerable expense, and unless the assaying is done at a Government office the bullion has to be reassayed before it can be shipped abroad. It was in the opinion of the Committee on Finance no more than a reasonable request on the part of this Territory, where so large a sum of bullion is obtained; and the amount appropriated is that which has heretofore been considered necessary for the establishment of a proper assay office.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it not true that after this bullion has been assayed it still requires to be transported? If it is to be used it must be minted. It becomes merely an article of merchandise, and therefore the fact that it has to be taken to Omaha or Denver or New York does not affect the question that is involved here.

Mr. MORRILL. It affects the question, especially where they transport ore to be assayed, and there is a considerable amount, I understand, of ore that is now transported.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it not true that there are plenty of private assay offices where this operation is carried on successfully? What is the necessity when the ore can be refined at private offices for the Government to undertake to carry on this business?

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. I did not think there would be any opposition to this measure. It is very clear that the assay offices are distributed all over the country, but unless bullion should be assayed by a Government office it would have to be reassayed before it could be shipped abroad.

Mr. BECK. I merely rose to say what the chairman has made very apparent to us, that the stamp of private assay offices does not bear the same authenticity that that of the Government assay offices does; and bullion frequently requires assaying because of the want of security that cannot be had at private assaying establishments.

Mr. McMILLAN. Did I understand the Senator from Kansas to say that there are communicating railroad facilities at this point with Denver?

Mr. INGALLS. Rapidly approaching completion, I am told.

Mr. McMILLAN. But there is no communication whatever by rail with that locality.

Mr. INGALLS. How does that change the proposition that whether there is rail or not the product of the assay offices has to be transported the same as the raw product of the mines?

Mr. McMILLAN. It answers the objection of the Senator that there are rail facilities with Deadwood by which the ore can be transported to Denver, and to points nearer his own locality. There is no communication by rail, I suppose, and everything has to be transported by coaches, and there is great danger and inconvenience.

Mr. INGALLS. How is the danger obviated by making the assay office a Government instead of a private establishment? How is the danger of transportation obviated?

Mr. McMILLAN. The ore will be assayed at Deadwood if there is a Government office there.

Mr. INGALLS. Precisely; but the Senator said that this would obviate the danger of transportation.

Mr. McMILLAN. I did not say that.

Mr. INGALLS. Can he inform us how the difficulty is obviated by having it a public assay instead of a private assay office?

Mr. McMILLAN. I did not make that statement the Senator attributes to me, but I understood him to state that there was communication by rail with this point, and I supposed the Senator was aware that there was no railroad there; I thought he ought to be.

Mr. INGALLS. I said it was rapidly approaching completion.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the letter of the Director of the Mint be read, which, I think, will satisfy everybody, excepting the Senator from Kansas, that the bill ought to pass.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF THE MINT,
Washington, D. C., April 1, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt by reference of the letter addressed to you by Hon. R. T. Pettigrew, asking your opinion as to the necessity and propriety of establishing an assay office at Deadwood, Dakota, with a copy of the bill introduced in the House of Representatives for that purpose, and your request for my report thereon.

An assay office is of great local advantage in any gold or silver producing region where the precious metals are found in placers and the country is being prospected for the discovery and development of new mines.

It is also of great advantage where the mines are scattered over a considerable area and gold is obtained in limited quantities from mining operations not requiring a large amount of capital, enabling miners to secure a convenient and speedy exchange of their unrefined bullion for coin without deduction for the expense and delay of its transportation to a distance for coinage.

The precious metals are found in the mountainous regions of the Black Hills, in the western part of Dakota, and extend beyond the line into Wyoming in an area which is being thoroughly prospected, and which yielded an increased amount from the time of the discovery of gold and silver in the Black Hills.

The gold deposits at the mints and assay offices of the United States from the mines of the Territory of Dakota amounted in the calendar year 1879 to $2,436,209.07, in 1880 to $3,196,188.62, and in 1881 to $3,474,837.

The greater portion of this was produced by a few mines which, having abundant capital and being able to send their gold to the Mint or to the New York assay office without loss, except in time and cost of transportation, would be little benefited by the establishment of an assay office; but to those interested in small or placer mines and in prospecting these regions it would be of great advantage to have a Government assay office where the value of their bullion could be accurately ascertained and paid in coin or bars and where reliable assays could be obtained upon which to determine the value of mines and ores and bullion obtained therefrom.

The production of gold during the last year in Dakota equals that produced in any State or Territory in which an assay office is at present located, and the establishment of an assay office at Deadwood would be useful to the miners in that Territory.

Respectfully,

HORATIO C. BURCHARD, Director.

Hon. CHARLES J. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES M. BLAKE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first case on the Calendar will be called.

The ACTING SECRETARY. A bill (S. No. 1015) for the relief of Charles M. Blake.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] to the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of California. At the request of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] the bill may go over until to-morrow. I wish to examine it further.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it go over without losing its place.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Without losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice and the next bill on the Calendar will be announced.

L. MADISON DAY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 73) for the relief of L. Madison Day.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. VEST. I wish to say a word upon the bill before it is put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri desire the yeas and nays on the pending question or on the passage of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will wait until after the argument of my colleague.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the amount of money involved in this bill is inconsiderable—$5,400 without interest is the entire amount; but I ask such Senators as feel any interest in the establishment of what I consider a very dangerous precedent to give me their attention for a very few moments.

I have no acquaintance with Mr. L. Madison Day, and none with the adversaries in this suit which is now transferred to the Senate of the United States. As to Mr. Judah P. Benjamin, his interest has entirely terminated, and he is no longer a citizen of this country.

I repeat that the amount of money involved in the suit is inconsiderable, but the precedent about to be established, if this bill is passed, is a most dangerous one and will certainly return to plague us in subsequent cases.

A brief résumé of the facts shows this condition of affairs: in 1858 Judah P. Benjamin and Joseph Benjamin, his brother, were owners of certain real estate in the city of New Orleans. They mortgaged that property for a bona fide indebtedness of $10,000 to one Mr. Micou, a citizen of New Orleans. In 1862 Judah P. Benjamin, having become secretary of state and afterward secretary of war of the confederacy, proceedings under the confiscation act were instituted against this property, not against the property of Joseph Benjamin, his brother, but against the interest of Judah P. Benjamin in this real estate. Judgment of confiscation was had, and the property was ordered to be sold. There is no sort of question or dispute but that the whole interest which was sold in this real estate was that of Judah P. Benjamin alone. The judgment was entered, and there was no notice to Joseph Benjamin and no pretense that he was a party to the record, directly or indirectly.

Just before the sale the most extraordinary judical order was entered ever known upon the records of this country. Judge Durell, whose name will never perish from the judicial annals of the United States, entered on record an order, without the slightest pretense of justice, law, right, or precedent, in which he declared that all mortgages upon property attempted to be confiscated should, by a single dash of the pen, be eliminated from the records of the court. It was a brutal order. It was not only unjust, it was not only contrary to precedent, it was not only without one scintilla of law or justice, but, I repeat, it was a brutal judicial order.

That order attempted to say to Micou, and afterward to his widow and heirs, who were the parties to the suit in the Supreme Court, Micou having died, that their $10,000 with interest, owing bona fide to them, should be eliminated and cease to be a just indebtedness. For that sort of action there cannot be the shadow or scintilla of a pretext; and when a lawyer comes before the Supreme Court of the United States, and afterward before the Senate, and says that he relied upon that order in order to obtain the title to real estate, it passes the bounds of ignorance. It is impossible that any man, whether a lawyer or not a lawyer, could have come to the conclusion that that order gave him any title whatever.

Mr. Day says that he bought at this sale, giving $5,400 for this property, and that he knew nothing about the title of Joseph Benjamin, and that he knew nothing about the mortgage put upon record in 1858. I submit to every honest and candid mind, is it possible that this gentleman, prowling amongst the records of New Orleans, a lawyer by profession, an eminent lawyer, who filed his elegantly-bound brief in the case of Day vs. Micou in the Supreme Court of the United States, and signed it "L. Madison Day in propriâ personâ," commencing his brief with English poetry and ending with the Greek classics, is it possible that this gentleman invested his $5,400 and never examined the record, and never knew that Joseph Benjamin had a title to this property, and that a mortgage for $10,000 in fair form of law was then spread upon the records of the parish of Orleans? Sir, I do not believe it, and I cannot believe it. It surpasses the bounds of the utmost credulity.

Mr. Day says he not only did not know that there was any mortgage and did not know that Joseph Benjamin had any title, but he says that he relied upon this order of Durell. He must have known as a lawyer that it was without one scintilla of the pretense of legal foundation. In addition to that, he relied upon the declaration of the United States marshal that the mortgage had been eliminated, and that the title was free.

Then we face this proposition: it is said now that the Government of the United States, having received the $5,400, is bound by the declaration of the United States marshal who made the sale. I say here to-day, and I call the attention of Senators to it, if that proposition obtains in this country, millions upon millions of dollars now in the Treasury of the United States must be taken out by force of the precedent that we now establish. If a United States marshal, can in making a sale, declare that the Government of the United States passes a perfect title, and if that amounts to a warranty or to a representation that binds the Government, what safety is there for the Treasury of the United States?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is out.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope my colleague will be permitted to go on. It was the understanding that there would be no restriction on this debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, is it possible that any lawyer, is it possible that any legislator, will assert the doctrine that a ministerial officer of the United States can bind this Government by a declaration made by him outside of his authority in making a sale of condemned property, or under the internal-revenue law, or in admiralty?

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from Missouri, in the same line: suppose a man acting under a power of attorney authorizing him to do certain acts sees proper to go beyond what he is authorized to do, would that bind his principal in any court?

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, not; it would be absolutely void; but here is a ministerial officer with powers and functions limited and prescribed by the law, and if the doctrine obtains that this officer can, in behalf of the United States, warrant a good title to this property, what is the result? Any corrupt man can go to a corrupt officer, and in the sale of any property, no matter what the amount, can have the understanding with him: "You put up the property and sell it, and make certain representations; I will buy it, and if it is a good bargain, we will hold it and divide; if it is a bad bargain, your representations will set it aside, and I will go to the Government for the money."

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask the Senator a question for information?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I read in one of the reports that the marshal exhibited at the sale that that mortgage was nullified and satisfied. On what was that certificate based? Where did he get the authority?

Mr. VEST. That certificate was based upon an absolutely illegal order of Judge Durell.

Mr. HAWLEY. There was no basis to it, then, but the order of the court?

Mr. VEST. None in the world, and it was made without notice and made without right.

Mr. BECK. It was a general order.

Mr. VEST. It was a general order declaring all mortgages in regard to confiscated property eliminated.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator will allow me, it was a general order made some months prior to the libeling of the property alleged to have been the property of Benjamin.

Mr. VEST. Yes; made on the motion of Government counsel. I care not on whose motion; it was absolutely void upon its face, as every lawyer must know, and a lawyer that did not know it ought to have had his license taken from him eo instanti and his name stricken from the roll. The proposition that a United States district judge, without any statute, without any principle of law or justice, could destroy my mortgage bona fide given to me for $10,000 of loaned money is so monstrous that the mere mention of it brings a blush of shame to the cheek of every lawyer that a man wearing the judicial ermine of this country ever entertained it for a moment, and it looks to me most marvelous to find such an outrage advanced as a defense for Mr. Day's purchase. Here the United States Government got the money, and it went to the benefit of the Army under the confiscation law; and now it is proposed to take it out of the pockets of the people of the United States to pay it to Day, after he expected and tried to get rid of a mortgage for $10,000 justly due to a widow woman and her children. We have heard a great deal here of the wrong and hardship perpetrated upon this man by taking his money and keeping it in the Treasury. Mr. Day examined this record afterward, and here is the brief in which he argued it over and over again. He knew all about the mortgage. After he got this information did he stop? Did he stop as soon as he found it was a bona fide mortgage? Did he stop as soon as he found the order of Durell was absolutely void and illegal? He persisted until the Supreme Court of the United States told him he could not destroy this mortgage.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Permit me to ask a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Suppose he had not contested for his right as against that mortgage, would he stand on as good a footing to-day with respect to the Government as he stands now, having contested the mortgage?

Mr. VEST. He could at least have satisfied himself with making a reasonable contest, if all he wanted was to make a case for relief in Congress, instead of filing that enormous brief, filled with English poetry and Greek classics and signed "L. Madison Day, in propriâ personâ," commencing with "The Star Spangled Banner" and winding up with a quotation from Lysias. He could, at least, have said: "I do not want to take the patrimony of these children and the little pittance left to this woman, Mrs. Micou; I will satisfy myself as a lawyer, a distinguished counselor and advocate, by making just such a case as will afterward give me relief from the Government;" but he invoked not only the civil but the military power of the Government in that brief, and he said the war was still flagrant and the attempt to take this property from him was an act of hostility against the Government!

Mr. MILLER, of California. What was the amount of the mortgage?

Mr. VEST. Ten thousand dollars, with interest from 1858.

Mr. MILLER, of California. And the purchase-money was $5,000?

Mr. VEST. Five thousand four hundred dollars, and he got in that purchase all that he bought, and that was the interest of Judah P. Benjamin, and the court never sold anything else, and the record shows that the court never pretended to sell anything else; and yet this gentleman claims now that he bought the interest of Joseph Benjamin, who never was a party to the suit, and never had anything to do with it, and besides that bought the land discharged of the mortgage of $10,000 for Mrs. Micou and her children. If that is not the heaviest judicial game I have ever known I shall be obliged to my brother lawyers for calling my attention to a precedent. Yet this is an unsophisticated country gentleman, who lived out of town and did not know his rights!

Mr. President, let us look for a moment at what the Supreme Court of the United States has said and the authorities in regard to this sale. I want to dispose of the question, that the Government is bound in law or equity by the declarations of a marshal. Rorer on Judicial Sales, pages 167 and 168, says:

> It is a well-settled principle that in judicial sales there is no warranty. The officer, trustee, or person executing the deed is the mere agent or instrument of the court; is not liable for defect of title or insufficiency of the proceedings; nor at all, except for fraud, unless he conveys with warranty, and then the covenant of warranty binds him personally, and him only.

Again, the same authority says on page 168:

> The rule of caveat emptor applies in all its rigor to judicial sales of real property.

Now, I call the attention of lawyers here to the Monte Allegre case decided in 9 Wheaton, 616. That was a sale of tobacco made by a Government officer, and he sold by sample and made false representations as to the quality of the tobacco. Afterward the claimant sued for the proceeds of the sale covered into the Treasury, and here is what the Supreme Court of the United States said:

> Generally in all judicial sales the doctrine of caveat emptor must necessarily apply from the nature of the transaction, there being no one to whom recourse can be had for the indemnity against any loss which may be sustained. Is there then anything peculiar in the powers of a court of admiralty that will authorize the interposition or justify granting relief to which a party is not entitled by the settled rules of the common law? We know of no such principle.

And there can be no case found, as I undertake to say, in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States where they have ever held that the doctrine of caveat emptor did not apply to proceedings in rem. Why, Mr. President, talk about cases! Here is a case decided by the Judiciary Committee of this body when Judge Thurman was the chairman of it, a gentleman who is reputed to be a pretty fair lawyer. Here was the bill, Senate bill No. 280, Forty-sixth Congress, first session, for the relief of Ann Gregory, widow of Charles N. Gregory, deceased. Now, listen:

> Whereas, by a decree of condemnation of the United States district court for the eastern district of Virginia, one certain tenement and lot of lands situate, lying, and being in the city of Alexandria, State of Virginia, being the property of William N. McVeigh, was condemned as forfeited to the United States, under the general confiscation act of July 17, 1862; that thereupon the said lot of land was sold, and the conveyance thereof made by John Underwood, as United States marshal for the eastern district of Virginia, to Charles N. Gregory, deceased; and that the said tenement and lot of land was conveyed by the said United States marshal, by deed bearing date the 11th day of April, 1864, to the said Charles N. Gregory, deceased, for the consideration of $1,500, which sum was paid into the Treasury of the United States; and
> Whereas, also, by judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered at its October term A. D. 1876, the sale of the said premises so made to the said Charles N. Gregory was declared void, and the said William N. McVeigh declared entitled to recover possession of the said premises, notwithstanding the sale thereof by the United States under the said decree of forfeiture and confiscation; and
> Whereas the said William N. McVeigh, under the judgment of the said Supreme Court, has recovered possession of the said premises so as aforesaid sold by the United States to the said Charles N. Gregory, deceased: Now, therefore,
> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed and required to pay to Ann Gregory, widow of Charles N. Gregory, deceased, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the said sum of $1,500, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the date of the sale of the said premises by the United States to the said Charles N. Gregory, deceased.

Exactly the case at bar. Upon that bill—

> The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 280) for the relief of Ann Gregory, widow of Charles N. Gregory, deceased, report:
> That the rule of caveat emptor applies to sales of the character mentioned in the preamble to said bill, and that the committee find nothing in the circumstances of this case that should except it from the operation of that rule. They therefore recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The record shows that there was not a vote against that proposition in the Senate. No lawyer then raised a point in favor of taking $1,500, a mere pittance, out of the Treasury of the United States and giving it to this poor woman, and Gregory was no lawyer; Gregory, who made this purchase, the dead husband of this woman, was no prowling assignee or attorney, hunting through the records, as this man Day was.

The evidence shows that Day first undertook to get his property by a tax title, and remained in possession four years and a half without paying any rent to the Government. He purchased under J. Madison Wells, and obtained a tax title from him. His object was to get an additional muniment of title by buying under the confiscation act, and yet we are told he is an innocent purchaser holding the property four years and a half without rent by the tax title, then buying under the confiscation act when he says he never examined the record and did not know that anybody but J. P. Benjamin had any interest in it.

Mr. INGALLS. When the attempt was made to foreclose the mortgage did he endeavor to set up his title?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir; he undertook it.

Mr. VEST. He was a party to that suit.

Mr. INGALLS. When the foreclosure of the mortgage occurred did he set up his confiscation title?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir; he was a party to that suit. That was the case that came up in which he filed the brief to which I have referred. Now, Mr. President, let us look a little further. When did this Government ever assert the doctrine or act upon it that we were bound by the representations of agents of the Government outside of their authority given by law? I want to call the attention of the Senate to a case pretty well known here, the case of the Cherokee Tobacco reported in one of the volumes of Wallace's Reports. That was a case in which Elias C. Boudinot and Stan Watie, his uncle, put up a tobacco factory in the Indian Territory under a solemn treaty made by the Government of the United States with the Indian tribe, in which they declared that no internal-revenue duty should be collected in that Territory. That factory was put up, and they went to manufacturing tobacco. Before they ever put up one single solitary plank in the way of building, or manufactured one single leaf of tobacco, they went to the Secretary of the Interior and to the Internal Revenue Bureau and inquired in regard to what the Government would do under the construction of that treaty, and they were told to go on and not one dollar would ever be collected from them. They did go on, and after the factory was in successful operation the officers of the United States levied on it for internal-revenue taxes and got away with over $50,000 worth of property, and Boudinot has been knocking at the doors of Congress for justice ever since, and to-day all he can get is a bill remitting him to the Court of Claims to there adjudicate the whole question.

Talk about hard cases before the Departments! There is another claim pretty well known here as the Ben Holladay claim. Mr. Holladay proved that the President of the United States, Abraham Lincoln, told him when he went to him in regard to the mails that he was carrying across the plains, "Mr. Holladay, move your mail service from one route to another. I will give you the troops of the United States to protect you." "But," said Holladay, "the Indians will break in and destroy my property." "If they do," said Lincoln, "Congress will pay you fully and indemnify you." And yet a majority of the Senate has held that neither Mr. Lincoln nor any other officer of this Government outside of the authority given him can bind the Government or make the Government responsible for his declarations unauthorized and unsanctioned by law.

But we are told that Mr. Day must be paid, a gentleman like Joseph of Arimathea, "a counselor learned in the law," this innocent, unsophisticated gentleman who filed his own brief in the Supreme Court, an expert in land titles, who made a business of getting hold of real estate for the purposes of profit—we are told that he must be protected!

The Senator from Florida relies greatly on the case in bankruptcy that went up, I believe, from the State of Florida and was decided in the circuit court of the United States. Permit me to say that the difference between that case and this is that that was a case between individuals where the money was still in court, still within the jurisdiction of the court; and upon a bill of review the circuit court simply said, "There has been a mistake here, injustice has been done, and we will give this money back," because the parties were all there and the subject-matter was there.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Permit me to ask a question. Can there be any possible difference in principle in this case because this fund is now in the Treasury of the United States; or, in other words, any difference between the case of a fund in the Treasury and this fund, if it was still in the exchequer of the district court at New Orleans?

Mr. VEST. Yes, Mr. President, a vast amount of difference. If this money was still in the hands of the court at New Orleans, no question of public policy, no question of great public precedent need be invoked, and the court could do with that money as it pleased. But here the money has been placed in the Treasury and spent for the benefit of the Army of the United States; and now Mr. Day comes and, under the pretext that he relied upon the declaration of the marshal or on the void order of Durell, seeks to reverse the principle of caveat emptor and take this money out of the Treasury. I say millions can be taken by the same precedent and the same rule, and any man who chooses, by a combination with a corrupt officer of the United States, may buy a piece of property at a sale under a condemnation in admiralty or an internal-revenue suit, and if he can get that officer to make certain declarations he can say to him: "If we find the sale profitable we will divide; and if not, we will set it aside and I will go to the Treasury of the United States and get back the money."

Here is a doctrine of great public policy, of precedent, which we are asked to strike down. The great rule of caveat emptor, we are told, does not apply to the Government of the United States, but that, so long as the Treasury is able to pay, this claimant has a right to come and demand the money.

But one word more in regard to the position on the other side, and I am done. I take no peculiar interest in the matter, and I discharge this simply as a public duty. I do not care for the $5,400 going to this man, but I see no claim in law or equity, nor the title or shadow of a claim here.

It is said now by my friend from Louisiana and my friend from Florida that this claim was made under the laws of Louisiana, and the doctrine of caveat emptor does not apply. As I understand the rule in Louisiana, where the civil law obtains, the purchaser must in the first place go upon the plaintiff-creditor, and exhaust his remedy there, before this rule applies. There is no pretext that this man has ever done that, or that Judah P. Benjamin has not to-day property in the State of Louisiana subject to his claim.

But, waiving all that, I announce the proposition that the law of Louisiana has nothing at all to do with this question. This was a sale under a United States statute; all the rights of the parties accrued under a United States statute, and the Supreme Court of the United States has decided over and over again that when the Federal tribunals are proceeding under a United States law they proceed under that statute until the execution is satisfied. Any other doctrine is monstrous. Do gentlemen seriously argue that the rights of the purchaser at a sale made by a United States court in Missouri are different from what they are in Louisiana? In Missouri the doctrine of caveat emptor applies, and in every other State of the Union except Louisiana. Is it possible that the State of Louisiana by a statute there can defeat the rights of a purchaser under a United States title when that cannot be done in any other State in this whole Union?

The Supreme Court has disposed of that question, has disposed of it in the case of Wayman vs. Southard, in 10 Wheaton, and Riggs vs. Johnson, in 6 Wallace, and another case in 9 Wallace, and in these cases the Supreme Court laid down what there can be no question about, that where the Federal tribunals are investigating a question under a State statute or a State constitution they will follow the highest tribunal of that State as to the rights of citizens; but when the United States is proceeding in its own courts under a United States statute, then, until the execution itself is paid, the process of the court and the remedy of the purchaser are all under the United States statutes. Any other proposition would subvert the great principle that a court has always the right under its own laws and proceedings to enforce its own judgments and give the proper remedy to purchasers under those judgments. That is the doctrine, and therefore the statute of Louisiana has nothing to do with the case.

Now, Mr. President, who is this Mr. L. Madison Day? Is he an innocent purchaser? Does he present himself to this tribunal in such phase and such guise that an exception should be made and a great rule of law and justice and precedent in his behalf? What is he trying to do, what has he been trying to do? He has been trying up to the time the Supreme Court of the United States decided against him to take $10,000 out of the pockets of this widow and these poor orphan children under a void and illegal and brutal order of this judge of the district court of the United States in Louisiana. Is he an ignorant man? Is he a poor, unsophisticated creature who comes into court and says, "I knew no law; I never opened a book; I am here in my simplicity, my innocence, my rural, unsophisticated, native innocence as a citizen of the country, and ask relief at the hands of its representatives?"

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator if he has read Day's brief in the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. VEST. I have it here. It was not like that of an ordinary member of the profession on ordinary paper, but he put it up in calfskin and filed it before the Supreme Court of the United States as a standing monument to his legal ability; it remains so to-day; and I have a copy in my hands. He was not satisfied with putting it in ordinary legal phrase, but he commences after this fashion—I ask my friends who are now advocating the bill to listen to the ground on which he puts his case:

> May it please the court: When the "Bonnie Blue Flag" went down before "The Star Spangled Banner," and that glorious emblem of "The Union, the Constitution, and the Enforcement of the Laws" again waved in triumph
> "From Maine's dark pines and crags of snow
> To where Magnolian breezes blow,"
> it was fondly hoped that civil strife and contention were at an end, and that peace, quiet, and repose had returned to bless the land.
> But those were
> "Hopes which but allured to fly;"
> they were, indeed, but
> "Joys that vanished whilst we sipp'd."
> For scarcely had the roar of artillery ceased and the smoke of battle cleared off, and scarcely had the ink become dry on the parchments of pardon, which fell from the Executive hand,
> "Thick as autumnal leaves that strow the brooks > In Vallombrosa," before some

> "Of the last few who, vainly brave," and who would theoretically, merely,

> "Die for the cause they could not save,"

rushed into the courts, renewed the contest in another form, and we are here to-day on a writ of error to the supreme court of Louisiana to reverse a victory obtained in this new mode of hostility and attack upon the power and authority of the United States and the rights of one which are firmly based upon the same.

Mr. Day declares that the war still continues, and that this was simply a new mode of attack after the shot and shell and saber strokes of the rebellion had been put down. That L. Madison Day, an unsophisticated country gentleman, a litigant, was the first victim to this new mode of attack. Then he went on and argued the proposition that this woman should be robbed of this $10,000 and interest; and finally concluded his brief thus:

> In propriâ personâ.

Mr. President, it has been some years since I studied Greek, and I do not propose to give a literal translation. If I might be permitted to give a translation peculiarly applicable to all the circumstances and facts of this case as declared from Mr. Day's own showing, I should say that it ought to be translated in the terse American language of the distinguished Artemus Ward: "He paid his money, and he took his chance." [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I do not think we are here to pass upon this gentleman's capabilities as a poet; his poetry may be very good, or it may be very bad; but I do not think that has much to do with this case. I know very little about Mr. L. Madison Day. I had no knowledge of him whatever when I first wrote the report in his case. I looked upon the facts as I would in any other case, and judged of his right to relief outside of his associations, his poetic aspirations, or anything else.

The argument of the Senator from Missouri goes too far. He undertakes to compare this case to the case of a man who is seeking to obtain from the Treasury money that he never paid into it. There is no such case here. When he speaks of that vast class of cases in which raids are intended to be made upon the Treasury by men who never deposited a dollar in its vaults, he is speaking of cases very different from this. When he speaks of that undefined and undefinable responsibility which may flow from the assertions of an officer at a sale, unaccompanied by any judgment of a court, he is speaking of that which does not exist in this case.

The case here rests upon a few facts; and outside of the antecedents of the man, his land-grabbing proclivities, his love for poetry and the old flag, and all that kind of thing, the case is to be determined by the Senate of the United States in a different vein from that. The question is, whether by reason of that very illegal order of the district judge, upon which he had a right to rely, having paid his money under it, he is not entitled to this fund from the Government of the United States the same as he would if the fund was still in the custody of the district court.

Mr. BECK. Why had he a right to rely upon that order?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. He relied upon it as numbers of other men of equal intelligence with him relied upon the authority of the district court to sell mortgaged property discharged of the lien of the mortgage under the bankrupt law, for which there was far more authority than existed in this case. There was not, from the beginning to end in the bankrupt law any authority which gave to a district judge the right to sell mortgaged property discharged of the lien; and still some judges directed the thing to be done, and one of the most intelligent citizens of the State whose Senator has just addressed me, backed up by the opinion of some able lawyers—I do not know whether they were from Kentucky or not—relied upon a similar judgment of a district court in my State and lost his whole fortune. Unfortunately for him there was no more authority under the first section of the bankrupt law for the district judge to sell property encumbered by a mortgage discharged of the lien than there was for Judge Durell to direct the sale of Benjamin's property under the confiscation law, discharged of the lien—not one bit. The confiscation law was directed against the estate of the party and the proceeding was in rem; and I suppose this district judge thought that inasmuch as the interests of the Government were paramount and could not be defeated by an intervening lien of a private party, he had a right to make effectual the confiscation law by selling the estate, and if it brought more than the amount of the mortgage to hold the residuary fund for the benefit of the mortgage creditor, but at the same time to make effectual the confiscation process.

That was the view entertained by several district judges under the bankrupt law. Administering this law in the spirit of what they called a great public policy, they went on and held in a number of instances, one especially in my State and some beyond it, that the policy of this law required the estate to be sold, and required it to be sold discharged of the lien, and they undertook to sell the mortgaged property discharged of the lien, holding the fund for the benefit of the mortgage-creditor and giving the purchaser a good title. Now, I say there was just as much authority for the one order as for the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired. Will the Senate give unanimous consent to the Senator from Florida to proceed? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I say there was just as much authority for the one order as for the other, and in the case I cited from Judge Bradley's decision the very identical principle was involved. The gentleman to whom I referred, one of the most intelligent men I ever knew, a citizen of the State of Kentucky, regarding the order of the district judge in Florida as conclusive on the mortgage-creditor, purchased an estate, as he thought discharged of the lien, and he took the property and kept it for three years and built it up, put improvements on it, and after that the mortgage-creditor came in and foreclosed over him and took away not only the amount of his original purchase but his improvements; and then the purchase-money was refunded to him by the circuit court, which was all it could do, upon the principle that the order of the district court had led him to believe and gave him reason to believe that he was taking the estate discharged of the lien.

The question here is not merely a matter of bounty: it is a matter of right. If that court had no authority to direct the property to be sold discharged of the lien of the mortgage, and the Government got the benefit by obtaining this man's money under an illegal order made by one of its own judges, upon what principle can it hold the fund? This is not a case where the party comes before the Senate to ask for a sum of money that he never paid into the public Treasury, on account of damages sustained by the misrepresentations of a marshal or any executive officer. It will be time enough to deal with such cases when they arise; but I say to the Senator from Missouri that this is not that case.

This man paid his money, as he says, upon the faith of the title guaranteed by the district court, and he has the very same demand against the Treasury, which has this money in it, that he would have if the fund was still in the coffers of the district court; and I ask here to-day if there is a lawyer in this body who is prepared to say that any chancellor in the United States, holding his commission under a State or the General Government, after he directed property to be sold discharged of a lien, whether legally or illegally, and it turned out that his order was invalid and inoperative, who would not, if he had control of the fund, restore it to the purchaser?

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator, does he believe that Mr. Day purchased that property and paid that $5,400 without ever looking at the record, without ever looking at the judgment, without knowing anything about it except what the marshal said at the sale?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I never directed my mind to that question, because it is entirely irrelevant.

Mr. VEST. I think it is very relevant.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It is entirely irrelevant. I have nothing to do with this man's motives, his belief, or his convictions; I am only acting upon this case as I find it upon the record. I find that the marshal did say at the sale that he sold this property discharged of the lien under the direction of the court. That was enough. I do not care whether Day before that time or not examined the record, but if it turns out to be true that the marshal had the authority of the court for making the declaration that he did make, this purchaser, no matter what his status was, had a right to stand upon that declaration.

Mr. VEST. Whether the judgment was void or not?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly; whether the judgment of the court was worth the paper it was written upon or not, he had to act upon that, just as Mr. Richardson, of Kentucky, did in the Florida case; and the one order was just as valid as the other, for Judge Locke had no more authority to direct the sale of the Alabama and Florida Railroad discharged of the lien of the first mortgage, under the bankrupt law, than Durell had to order the sale of Benjamin's property discharged of the Micou mortgage. How did the court deal with Richardson when he came back after having had possession of the property for three years? "Yes, you are entitled to your fund; you are entitled to your money, because the district judge by an illegal order directed that property to be sold discharged of the lien, and this court pronounce the order a nullity." Why was not Richardson held to the doctrine of caveat emptor by one of the best common-law judges that ever sat in the United States?

Mr. VEST. Was there ever a final confirmation of that sale?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, sir; it was finally confirmed.

Mr. VEST. It was considered in the circuit court on a bill of review.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It was disposed of there on a bill of review in equity when all the equities were considered. When I say that of Judge Bradley I say nothing but what the profession universally admits, that as a common-law judge and a man capable of administering the rights of property between citizens according to that code, he has no superior in this country. He held that the doctrine of caveat emptor did not apply; that the district judge's order was an absolute nullity, and that inasmuch as the purchaser had a right to rely upon it as valid, he not being held to strict judgment whether it was right or not, as he paid his money on the faith of it he was entitled to a restitution of the fund.

Where is the difference between that case and this? The district judge, taking that narrow view which prevailed in the first days of the bankrupt law, thought, as I said awhile ago, that public policy required that all of this property should be sold discharged of the lien of the mortgage and the fund held for the benefit of the mortgage creditor; but the court of review said no, and it is possible that this man Durell, taking this confiscation law in the midst of war, and thinking the Government intended in a case of confiscation to seize the estate and sell it whether mortgaged or not, reserving as far as it was possible to reserve the right of the mortgagee against the fund, directed the sale of the property discharged of the lien. Where is the difference in principle between the two cases? There was just as much authority for the one as for the other.

With this man's poetry, with his professed love for the old flag, and all that kind of thing, I have nothing to do. I have nothing to do with this case but as a Senator representing in part the interests of the Government, and not willing that for any cause injustice or wrong shall be done to any man, no matter what his opinions or condition may have been.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, I am a member of the committee from which this bill was favorably reported. I have had some acquaintance with the claim since it first appeared in the Forty-fourth Congress. A bill for the relief of Mr. Day was introduced in the Forty-fourth Congress and referred to the Committee on Claims, of which I was then a member. It was assigned by that committee to the Senator from Florida, who has just taken his seat, as a sub-committee for investigation and report.

Mr. COCKRELL. It was first referred to the Senator from Missouri and by him adversely reported, and that adverse report approved by the committee and submitted to the Senate, and then it was reconsidered and recommitted to the committee and referred to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well. How many of the reports have been adverse? How many favorable?

Mr. VEST. I think three on each side. There have been really three favorable reports, and they are copies of each other. Generally the Senator reporting favorably contented himself with a copy of the previous reports. I think they stand about equal in number and as to character of the lawyers who made them.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. As the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] states, the case was first assigned to him as a sub-committee. I now recollect that fact; I did not at the time I made the remark that it was assigned to the Senator from Florida. He came to an unfavorable conclusion upon the claim. It was afterward, as I said, assigned to the Senator from Florida, who reported favorably upon the bill. I concurred in that report. It has been reported several times favorably from the Committee on Claims. I have concurred in all of these reports.

Mr. COCKRELL. And there has always been a minority report.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not every time, because there is no minority report now. There always was a minority report so long as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] remained upon that committee, but as soon as he went off the committee the committee reported unanimously in favor of the passage of this bill.

The facts in regard to this claim are pretty well understood. The Senator from Missouri the other day, the senior Senator from that State, [Mr. COCKRELL,] assumed to give the facts exactly as they were. He was not content to say that he would state the facts exactly as he understood them, but he assumed to state the facts exactly as they are. Now, I know something about the facts, and I do not agree with the Senator from Missouri in his statement of all the facts. I ventured the other day, when the Senator was addressing the Senate, to inquire if the court did not find that these two squares of ground were the property of Judah P. Benjamin. The Senator had made a very energetic argument—I think I can very safely say it was an energetic argument if I cannot say anything more in commendation of it—asserting that Joseph Benjamin was a part owner of these two squares of ground, and I made the inquiry to which I have referred. The Senator replied very emphatically that the court found nothing of the kind. I did not have the record before me at that time, and he appeared so confident about it that he put me down for the time being. I have since, however, examined the record and I find that I was right and he was wrong.

Mr. COCKRELL. What record does the Senator speak of, and what court?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I refer to the district court in Louisiana.

Mr. COCKRELL. That may be. That court may have found that fact, but the Supreme Court did not find it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That was the inquiry I made at the time.

Mr. COCKRELL. You do not find it in the Supreme Court report by any means.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I was not speaking about the Supreme Court reports.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is what I was referring to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I was speaking of the district court in Louisiana which passed upon the question before the sale was made. Now, it does appear that in 1858 Joseph Benjamin and Judah P. Benjamin were the owners, each owning a moiety, of the lands. I have the libel which was filed against these squares of ground before me. It is alleged in that libel, after giving a description of the land—

That Judah P. Benjamin is, and was on the 17th day of July, 1862, and previously thereto had been, the owner of the above described property.

Not the owner of one-half of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRISON in the chair.) The time of the Senator from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let him go on. That is the understanding as to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That, then, is the allegation of the libel, that Judah P. Benjamin was the owner, not of a certain interest, but the owner of these two squares of ground. I have the finding of the district court before me, and the district court find as a fact that Judah P. Benjamin was the owner of these two squares of ground. That was the inquiry I made the other day, and the fact which the Senator from Missouri so emphatically denied.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me, here is the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which says that that judgment was illegal.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am aware of that; but that was not the inquiry to which I addressed myself at that time.

Mr. VEST. It is a pertinent inquiry what that tribunal thought of it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That inquiry is not pertinent for the reason that this finding of the Louisiana district court was made prior to the sale of the ground, prior to the purchase of it by Day. It was a decision upon which, as we contend, he had a right to rely, and upon which, as a fact, he did rely for the purposes of this case, I contend, no matter what the Supreme Court found three or four years afterward.

It is asserted that Mr. Day ought to have known of the existence of this mortgage, and ought to have known that the order of Judge Durell, under which the mortgage was canceled, was void. The order of Judge Durell was not made in this case; it had no particular reference to this case; it was made a number of months before the Benjamin land was libeled, and it had reference not only to this case but to all similar cases in that judicial district. There is no question about the fact that this order was entered upon the motion of the United States district attorney for that judicial district; that the order was made by Judge Durell; that at the time this sale was made, immediately before the sale the marshal made public outcry that all mortgages upon this property would be canceled pursuant to the order of the district court. Mr. Day was present and heard that statement made by the marshal, and he declared that he relied upon that statement; and we claim that he had a right to rely upon it.

Some question has been raised in regard to the value of this property. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] attempted the other day—perhaps I ought not to say that he attempted; but possibly he might have attempted to raise a slight prejudice against Mr. Day by declaring that he was a speculator in confiscated estates. The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] declares that he was a tax-title speculator, or words to that effect. The facts are that this property was seized as the property of Judah P. Benjamin, as abandoned property, by the authority of the United States in 1862; that it was in possession of the United States as abandoned property, and that it was leased to Mr. Day. It does appear from the record that some time in 1864 the property was sold in default of the payment of taxes upon it; that it was bought by J. Madison Wells, and that subsequently, whether before or after this marshal's sale I am not now prepared to say, at the tax sale the property was sold to Wells, and subsequently Mr. Day purchased whatever interest Wells had in the land under that tax sale.

The Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] the other day inquired whether or not Mr. Day had been in possession of this property for any considerable length of time, and inquired what the value of the rental of the property was. It is true that Mr. Day went into possession of this land; it is also true that he made improvements upon it to the amount of four or five thousand dollars. When it was sold upon the Micou mortgage it was purchased by Mr. ELLIS, now a member of the House, and it is now owned by him. It was purchased for $10,000 by Mr. ELLIS. I have the RECORD of 1880 before me, in which Mr. ELLIS made some remarks concerning this claim. He states that he was familiar with the value of the property at the time it was purchased by Day, and that Day paid its full value at that time. If he had supposed that he was purchasing a half interest or the life interest of one of the owners, or if he had known that the order of Judge Durell under which the mortgage was canceled was void, is it at all probable that he would have purchased and paid for the property its full value at that time?

Mr. FARLEY. Did he not merely pay the value of the title he got?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is not what Mr. ELLIS says. Mr. ELLIS says that Day paid its full value at that time, not the full value of the title which he was getting, because it appears that title was of no value at all. Perhaps some Senator may entertain a prejudice against Mr. Day for having purchased this land. Here is what Mr. ELLIS said about it in the other House:

> My friend from New York who has just preceded me [Mr. VAN VOORHIS] has pursued the line of thought that I had contemplated pursuing, and my labors therefore will be very much lightened, and I shall occupy but little of the time of the committee. I have heard with some regret that there has been an attempt made to create the impression that the claimant in this case was an adventurer, a stranger, a camp-follower, and an informer; one who, holding no convictions upon either side of the civil war which lately convulsed this Republic, occupied his time in purchasing confiscated property and making money out of the miseries and exigencies of the country. I say I regret to find that an attempt has been made to create this impression.
> This must be my excuse and my apology for informing the committee that Mr. Day, the claimant, was a resident of the State of Louisiana a long time before the war began. He was a native of Kentucky, and came to Louisiana twelve years before the beginning of the war and entered into the practice of law there. He was conservative in politics, a candidate for elector on the Bell and Everett ticket in 1860, and when the war actually began he sided with the Union cause.
> Since the war he has pursued the practice of his profession, and is universally esteemed and beloved by those who know him. His character for integrity, for honesty, and for fair dealing is equal to that of any gentleman who sits on the floor of this House.

This bill has been reported favorably in the House of Representatives during the present session of Congress. The report was made from the House Committee on Claims by Mr. MASON, of New York. He discusses in his report the question of caveat emptor, and he does not at all agree with either of the Senators from Missouri in regard to that. I will quote from his report:

> This is not a case to which the rule of caveat emptor can be applied for several reasons.
> In the first place it might be quite sufficient to say that as it has been expressly and definitely settled by the Supreme Court of the United States (in Wheaton vs. Peters, 8 Pet., 658) that there is no common law of the United States, and no principle which pervades the Union or has the authority of law that is not embodied in the Constitution and laws of the Union, caveat emptor, as it may exist in England and in some of the different States, cannot be invoked as applicable to a sale of property by the Government as its own when that doctrine has not been embodied in any Federal law.
> Indeed, the confiscation act, so far from adopting or countenancing the doctrine of caveat emptor, expressly required that the proceedings should be in rem, and that if the property libeled should be found to have belonged to a person engaged in rebellion, &c., the same should be condemned as enemies' property, and become the property of the United States, and might be disposed of as the court should decree.
> And it was further provided that the courts intrusted with the execution of the statute should have power to establish such form of decree, and to direct such deeds to be executed and delivered where real estate was sold as should fully and efficiently effect the purposes of the act, and vest good and valid titles in the purchasers. (See 12 United States Statutes, 591, sections 7 and 8.)

It was under section 8 of the confiscation act that the order of Judge Durell was made; and notwithstanding what the junior Senator from Missouri has said, it was believed at that time by many good lawyers that the order was a valid order and that all cancellations of mortgages made under it were valid and effectual.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the bill goes over until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. Cannot we have a vote on it now?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will not say anything more if we can get a vote on the bill now.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will detain the Senate for but one word in regard to the only fact which the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it the pleasure of the Senate that the case shall be disposed of? Then the Senator from Wisconsin may wish to be heard.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I give way.

Mr. COCKRELL. The only fact that the Senator from Wisconsin controverted in my statement of the facts was the finding of the court. My good friend did not take the time to read that finding of the court, but he read from the bill of complaint that was filed. Now, I will read from the finding of the court, as it is called, and we shall see whether the court finds as a fact that the title of that property was in Judah P. Benjamin alone. I say it does not do it:

> The delay allowed by law having expired, and no claim or defense having been filed, on motion of the district attorney it is ordered that all persons interested in the property seized be pronounced in contumacy and default, and the libel adjudged and taken pro confesso. And the monition issued in this case having been heretofore returned, the usual proclamation having been made, the default of all persons duly entered, and the law and the evidence considered, it is thereupon, on motion of the district attorney, ordered, sentenced, and decreed by the court now here, and his honor the district judge, by virtue of the power and authority in him vested, doth hereby order, sentence, and decree that the two squares of ground with all the improvements thereon, the property of J. P. Benjamin, fully described in the libel of information on file be, and they are hereby, condemned as forfeited to the United States.

There was no issue as to whether the property belonged to Judah P. Benjamin or not, and there was no evidence upon it, and they simply put that in the decree as a matter of form.

Now, Mr. President, I say when Don A. Pardee tried it, when the matter was brought up and there was a contest over the title, the record will be found to show title in Judah P. Benjamin and Joseph Benjamin, and the Supreme Court says that——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I was not disputing that. I simply said that the record——

Mr. COCKRELL. The record showed that the title was in Judah P. Benjamin and Joseph Benjamin.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. What do you mean by the "record?"

Mr. COCKRELL. The county records, where land titles are recorded.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I was not speaking of those, but of the record of the district court.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, I move that this bill be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, where it properly belongs and where similar bills have been sent.

Mr. GEORGE. I object to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to the further consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The further consideration of the bill is objected to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The motion to recommit opens a new question. I think this bill has occupied enough of the time and attention of the Senate in the way of the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It will be in the way of the Calendar to-morrow. Can we not dispose of it to-day, so that it shall not block that?

Mr. SHERMAN. The question of recommittal naturally gives rise to further debate, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] rises to address the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. I do object, most seriously, to having the action of the Committee on Claims reviewed and revised by the Judiciary Committee, as if that committee had a supervisory power and jurisdiction over the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a very unusual proceeding. I therefore object to the further consideration of the bill to-day.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to make some remarks on the motion of reference.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we can have a direct vote, I shall not object.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not asking for consideration. I do not object to its being disposed of, and I supposed a vote would be taken on the question of recommittal on the same arguments which have been had here. I did not suppose there would be any additional arguments in the case.

Mr. GEORGE. There are some additional considerations to be noticed when it is proposed to recommit the report of the Committee on Claims to another committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio has objected to the further consideration of the bill to-day.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that objection is the objection under the Anthony rule. It is only an objection to the further consideration of the bill after two o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is all. The bill goes over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4429) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BOSTON AND PORTSMOUTH NAVY-YARDS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask consent to have an order made, which will be granted of course, I suppose. Some two or three weeks ago the Senate, on my motion, directed the Secretary of the Navy to send to the Senate the history of the Portsmouth and Charlestown navy-yards, and that history has been sent. It is not very voluminous but it is in manuscript in a number of volumes. I have examined it, and it does not seem to me necessary to have it printed or to retain it further in the possession of the Senate. The extracts from the deeds which show the title of the United States to the navy-yard at Charlestown and extracts from the report which show its value for defense, are very short and can at any time be obtained from the Secretary of the Navy and used by any Senator in a speech or otherwise, without the necessity of a printed document. I therefore move that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to return to the Secretary of the Navy the manuscript histories of the navy-yards at Charlestown and Portsmouth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts? There being no objection, that order is made.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SLATER, it was Ordered. That the papers in the case of William Gallick be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the bill S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, at the close of the morning business, before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of cases under the Anthony rule, I shall ask the Senate to take up the Japanese indemnity bill.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have no objection to taking up the Japanese indemnity bill; but I have given notice day after day that I would ask the Senate to consider the interoceanic-railway bill. The concession made by the Mexican Government to Captain Eads expires in about twelve months. Captain Eads desires to go to Europe. It is due to him and due to the Government of Mexico that some act in regard to it should be taken by the United States at the present session of Congress. I only ask that the bill be taken up and considered by the Senate, because if not considered now the probabilities are that Captain Eads will have to apply to the Mexican Government for an extension of the concession granted by it. Under all the circumstances of the case, I think it is only fair and just, as I have waited very patiently for some months, having presented an elaborate report in the case, that the Senate should take up the bill which has been repeatedly delayed and give it some consideration. I think under the peculiar circumstances surrounding this bill we ought to consider it.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Missouri perhaps did not observe that I gave notice that in the morning hour, after the expiration of morning business proper, and before the application of the Anthony rule, I should ask the Senate to take up the Japanese indemnity bill to-morrow.

Mr. VEST. I understood that.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to make an inquiry as to what has become of the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) It is pending.

Mr. PLUMB. I give notice that I shall oppose the taking up of anything which shall displace the unfinished business or in any way prolong it, because I have repeatedly given notice that when the unfinished business was disposed of I should ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the 5 per cent. bill; but if we are to have the Japanese indemnity and the Tehuantepec ship-canal and other things, which can just as well wait, pressed forward, of course we shall have a general scramble as to what bills shall be postponed.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from Kansas propose to take up the 5 per cent. bill in the morning hour to-morrow?

Mr. PLUMB. No, I do not in the morning hour.

Mr. MORGAN. I propose to take up the Japanese indemnity bill in the morning hour.

Mr. PLUMB. When the morning hour arrives to-morrow it will be time enough to make the motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to say that the next bill but one on the Calendar under the Anthony rule is a bill that I have tried for the last two or three weeks to get the Senate to consider, and I shall certainly insist upon the regular order, so far as that rule is concerned, until the bill to which I refer has been reached and considered.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] to strike out the second section.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, when this matter was before the Senate yesterday, I endeavored to obtain from the only representative of the Judiciary Committee in view at the time, a statement to what extent the existing jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States went with respect to writs of error from judgments of the district court. I have since ascertained that there has been some recent legislation on this subject, for in 1879 Congress passed an act in the following words:

> The circuit court for each judicial district shall have jurisdiction of writs of error in all criminal cases tried before the district court where the sentence is imprisonment or fine and imprisonment, or where, if a fine only, the fine shall exceed the sum of $300; and in such case a respondent feeling himself aggrieved by a decision of a district court, may except to the opinion of the court, and tender his bill of exceptions, which shall be settled and allowed according to the truth, and signed by the judge, and it shall be a part of the record of the case.
> SEC. 2. Within one year next after the end of the term at which such sentence shall be pronounced, and not after, the respondent may petition for a writ of error from the judgment of the district court in the cases named in the preceding section, which petition shall be presented to the circuit judge or circuit justice in term or vacation, who, on consideration of the importance and difficulty of the questions presented in the record, may allow such writ of error, and may order that such writ shall operate as a stay of proceedings under the sentence; but the allowance of such writ shall not so operate without such order.

This act was approved March 3, 1879, but I suppose that, under the bill reported by the honorable Senator from Illinois, an appeal will lie in all criminal cases under this act from any judgment or sentence of a district or circuit court of the United States. Am I right in that?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. When the Senator gets through, I can tell him what this section is.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. So far as that section goes, it declares as I have stated that no appeal or writ of error after the passage of this act shall be prosecuted from any district to a circuit court. That is clear enough. Now, under the existing law, as was stated by the Senator from Alabama, there exists an appeal in all admiralty cases where the suit is between private parties, or in suits in equity where the Government is a party, where the amount involved exceeds $50, and I stated that that was a meritorious jurisdiction.

The district court also has jurisdiction, I think, under what is known as the civil-rights bill. A suit may be brought by a party conceiving himself aggrieved under the civil-rights bill, in the district court of the United States, and a judgment may be rendered against the defendant in that tribunal for a sum less than $500 and he has no appeal. I would state to the honorable Senator that as the civil-rights bill now stands a person can be sued in one of the district courts of the United States for any sum the plaintiff thinks proper to claim, and if the judgment is for a sum less than $500, under this bill the defendant has no appeal. As the law now stands he has an appeal, and this section takes away that redress. So that if anybody imagines that he was deprived of any of those numerous rights mentioned in the civil-rights bill, and should bring suit in the district court of the United States to recover damages to the extent of $500 in that court, if this section becomes a law, in my opinion the defendant has no appeal. If the law remains as it is he can appeal from the district court to the circuit court. Of course he can go no further, but that in many cases would be a very considerable relief.

The Senator from Alabama who participated in the debate yesterday stated the existing jurisdiction of the district court, as found in sections 631 and 633 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 631. From all final decrees of a district court in causes of equity or of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, except prize causes, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of $50, exclusive of costs, an appeal shall be allowed to the circuit court next to be held in such district, and such circuit court is required to receive, hear, and determine such appeal.

SEC. 633. Final judgments of a district court in civil actions, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of $50, exclusive of costs, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in a circuit court, holden in the same district, upon a writ of error.

I tried to get that information from the representative of the Judiciary Committee yesterday, but he would not give it to me, and I found it outside of him. These are instances in which the district courts of the United States have jurisdiction and in which appeals may be prosecuted to the circuit court.

Section 2 of the present bill reads as follows:

That the several circuit courts of the United States shall have and exercise no jurisdiction in cases of appeals or writs of error from the district courts allowed, taken, or sued out after the 1st day of September, 1882, except that reviews in bankruptcy cases, in the exercise of their supervisory jurisdiction, may be had as heretofore provided.

Now, I am in favor of retaining jurisdiction both by appeal and by writ of error from the district court to the circuit court in all cases under $500 where it now exists. Of course under the existing bill an appeal will lie in all those cases where the amount in controversy exceeds $500, but it takes away at the same time all right of appeal from the district to the circuit court in cases over fifty and under five hundred dollars. I do not think that any thing which appertains to the pressure of business in the Supreme Court requires this to be done; and I think that the meritorious, humble suitors who may desire to invoke the jurisdiction of a superior tribunal under existing law and who may not happen to have more involved than $500 ought to have the right of appeal as it now exists, and if they are dissatisfied with the judgment of the district court of the United States in any of the cases mentioned in the sections of the Revised Statutes that I have read, those suitors ought to be permitted to go to the circuit court.

I first thought the object I had in view might be accomplished by simply striking out the second section of this bill and leaving the law as it now stands on the statute-book, but on reflection I am of the opinion that after striking out it would be wise to insert a new section to give effect to the views that I entertain, and I propose the following section:

From all final decrees of a district court in cases of admiralty or of equity, except prize cases, when the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of $50, and not under $500, an appeal shall be allowed to the circuit court from the district court in accordance with existing laws.

Final judgment of the district court in civil cases where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of $50, exclusive of costs, and under $500, may be re-examined, reversed, or affirmed in a circuit court upon writ of error.

I say that if we are to have this bill perfected into a law, I am in favor of retaining this subordinate appellate power that now exists; and that is the object of my amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I do not expect that anything in the bill will satisfy the Senator from Florida. It is easy to criticise anything, and he has criticised this bill from the first section to the end of it.

This is a scheme which occupied the minds of the Judiciary Committee for a long time. It is not my scheme; I did not originally introduce it to the country. It was introduced substantially by a distinguished gentleman from Illinois, who occupied a seat on this floor for many years, Judge Douglas, but it did not then become a law. It afterward was introduced in the Senate by Judge Harris, of New York, pretty much in the same form as now proposed, but it did not pass the House. Mr. McCrary, who was Secretary of War under President Hayes, took this matter in charge when he was in Congress as to the necessity of relieving the Supreme Court, and also of adding judicial force in the States, and my recollection is that his bill passed the House, but at any rate it was reported with an elaborate report to the Senate, and is substantially this bill.

When I came into the Senate I thought I might be of some use in judicial matters; I did not think I could be of much use in other matters, because my whole life had been devoted to the investigation of law questions and to the consideration of what was necessary to relieve both State and Federal tribunals. This particular bill was prepared by myself and Judge Drummond, with some amendments, of course, to the original bill. It was submitted to the Bar Association of New York and they made some amendments to it; and to-day I have received the following telegram:

NEW YORK, May 9, 1882.

To Hon. DAVID DAVIS, Washington, D. C.:

Bar Association city New York to-night passed unanimously following resolution at meeting called specially to consider subject:

Resolved, That the association respectfully recommend to Congress the adoption of the bill now under consideration in the Senate of the United States establishing a court of appeals, and introduced by Senator DAVIS, of Illinois.

B. F. LEE,
Chairman Special Committee.

I wish to say this much to explain about the nature of this bill. I do not claim its authorship; it was suggested by others, and I introduced it. Having been on the Supreme Court bench for fifteen years I thought I saw some necessity for relieving the overburdened docket of that tribunal, and also the necessity of adding judges in this country to the Federal judiciary.

The bill embraces an entire scheme. Of course every section can be criticised, but as a whole those who are in favor of it should vote for it; those who are opposed to it should vote against it. If gentlemen think that this is not the proper plan of relief, by creating these intermediate courts, let them vote against the bill. That course I think would commend itself to everybody. At present, not only in little matters of $50 and $100, but in matters involving $100,000, an appeal lies from the district court of the United States to the circuit court. I myself, sitting as a circuit judge, tried an appeal from the district court in the State where you, Mr. President, [Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair,] live, embracing several hundred thousand dollars. I never did try an appeal of $50 or $100. Those latter are chiefly cases of seamen's wages, and anybody fit to sit on the bench at all is generally competent to decide them.

There may be some question of law involved occasionally which the district judge consults the circuit judge about, so that there is never substantially any appeal on such subjects to the circuit court. I held court for fifteen years in Chicago, Milwaukee, Madison, and Indianapolis, and I never knew an appeal under $500 to the circuit court from the district court. Now, there is an appeal to the circuit court, and then an appeal from there to the Supreme Court of the United States. This bill proposes to abolish the appeal to the circuit court, and to say that in all cases there shall be an appeal to the court of appeals, and no intermediate appeal to a circuit court. That is the scheme of this bill, the scheme of the second section, the scheme throughout. It was believed that any case should not be reinvestigated that did not involve $500. Any case above that may go to the court of appeals. That is the amount for which a suitor can now sue in the circuit court. He cannot sue there unless he has that amount involved. The circuit judges will be by this bill practically constituted district judges and will hold district courts, and they certainly are competent to decide cases up to $500. There must be some limit to appeals, otherwise you cannot carry on the business of the country. That is the scheme of this bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Why is a greater duty devolved on us to furnish the mass of the corporations who have $10,000 involved in a suit, which may be but a small part of their wealth, an appeal, when we refuse to the citizen an appeal in a case involving $500, when that may be all he possesses in the world?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is the poor man's argument, which I have heard so much about.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to say a word? This is a government of poor men; a large majority of its citizens are poor men.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. This scheme, as I said, is based upon the theory that any judge who is appointed to sit in a Federal tribunal is competent to decide a $500 case. He is competent to decide a $5,000 case now, for there is no appeal from a circuit judge at all in a common-law case under $5,000, or in an equity case under $5,000, or in admiralty, or anything else under that sum. The poor man goes up to the circuit court at the present time, but there is no appeal to the Supreme Court in a case under $5,000.

I have some decisions to read at the proper time, for the benefit of my friend from Florida, in relation to the constitutional question that the Supreme Court have decided at this term; they decided it long ago, but they have reaffirmed it at this time, against him of course.

Now, sir, why should this bill be amended? Why strike at the scheme that we have adopted? If the scheme is unwise it can be amended hereafter or can be repealed; but we proceed upon the theory that an intermediate court should be provided from which writs of error are to go, instead of going directly from a circuit court of the United States, and that all appeals shall be taken from district and circuit courts to this intermediate court of appeals, and that whereas now no case can be examined by the Supreme Court under $5,000, from four to six gentlemen shall be permitted to examine it wherever it is between $5,000 and $10,000. If this is not liberal and in the direction of the poor man that my friend from Mississippi speaks of, I do not know what is.

If gentlemen believe that the scheme of intermediate courts is wrong, and that there should be an increase of judges of the Supreme Court—I do not take it as any offense that they oppose my views in that regard—then of course they are opposed to this bill; or if they are opposed to any action on this subject, then they are opposed to the bill; but why go on and criticise this bill section by section and word by word when it is plain enough what the scheme of this bill is? We have refused repeatedly to adopt any of these amendments, and it strikes me that the Senate should not hesitate to vote this one down.

I wanted to read some decisions to the Senator from Florida, but he has left, and I will take another opportunity to do that. I hope the Senate will vote down this amendment.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I am reluctant to take part in the debate upon the pending bill, but I feel it to be a duty of those who have the power to increase or diminish the judicial tribunals and their exercise of judicial power, a duty that they owe to the country, to their proper discharge of this important duty, and to themselves, to give expression to their opinions to the end that they may be considered and carefully weighed and accepted for such force and effect as they may justly have.

This fair, candid, and calm mutual statement of thought on any given subject is the constitutional office of the Senate and the constitutional duty of Senators. I am not therefore permitted by my own sense of duty to the place and the subject to refrain from the expression of my thoughts, and I will preface the remarks I shall make by the statement that I am not unwilling to trust the President of the United States with the nomination of a reasonable number of judges.

I hope that the President will be able to rise to the generous ambition of being the President of the United States, of all the people of the United States, and not of a part of the United States and of a party among the people, and to leave behind him and to posterity the honorable fame of having administered the functions of his high office for the permanent glory and happiness of the country.

For the Senator from Illinois who has reported this bill I have the highest respect and the greatest confidence. There is no extent of constitutional power, either political or judicial, that I would be unwilling to intrust to him with entire confidence that it would be exercised with a single purpose to promote the interest and happiness and prosperity of the country.

I therefore approach the consideration of this bill with impartiality. What, then, Mr. President, is the bill and what the object which it proposes to attain? It is a bill to establish a court of appeals and to prescribe the jurisdiction of the court, its modes of proceeding, its organization, and to provide for the appointment of eighteen new judges. The object which it proposes to accomplish is to speed the decision of causes in the courts of the United States by diminishing the number of cases to be heard before the Supreme Court.

The essential features of the bill are: to create an intermediate appellate tribunal; to increase the number of judges and courts of the United States; to establish an appellate or revisory criminal jurisdiction in the United States courts; to make the decision of such tribunal conclusive as to the facts; to increase the value required for the voluntary access of the suitor to the Supreme Court.

I am content, under the eminent authority of the Senator from Illinois, to accept the intermediate exercise of appellate power. I can also perceive some connection in reason between the legislative power to regulate the exercise of appellate power and provide for a judicial ascertainment of the facts upon which errors may be taken and the provision of this bill that the finding of the intermediate court shall be conclusive as to the facts, but I am decidedly of the opinion that the ends of a fair and impartial trial will require the exercise of supreme appellate power both as to the facts and the law.

But the essential feature of this bill is its effect in increasing the frequency and the facility of the exercise of judicial power by the courts of the United States, by the increase of the number of the judges and courts, and their distribution throughout the United States. In connection with the character and extent of that judicial power as now interpreted by the Supreme Court and acquiesced in by the executive and legislative departments of the Government, and the effect upon the general welfare of the people of the United States, and the perpetuity of our Government and institutions; the fair and just consideration of this subject will require us to rise above the region of party or sections or vain and dogmatic assertions into the atmosphere of pure and dispassionate reason and calm reflection, to consider the subject in the light of history, ever remembering that the institutions of government cannot be either founded or preserved in the caprices of opinion, but must have their foundations in the permanent causes which under moral law controls and governs human nature—its motives, affections, and thought.

The Constitution, or fundamental law of our institutions and form of government, in article 3 provides the extent of judicial power: it "shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties, to embassadors, to admiralty and maritime cases, to cases where the United States is a party, to cases between two States, between citizens of different States, to claims of lands under grants from different States, cases between a State or her citizens and foreign states or subjects.

The manner in which this judicial power shall be exercised is made an equally essential part of our form of government as the extent of the power in respect to the subjects which it embraces, and is equally included within the limitation of the judicial power.

In all cases, except where embassadors, consuls, and a State shall be a party, the judicial power shall be appellate, both as to law and fact; that is, after some other tribunal shall have decided the cause. It has never been doubted, and it cannot reasonably be denied, that this limitation of the supreme judicial power to its appellate exercise and its implied prohibition of any revisory power over State courts, in the inferior tribunals established by Congress, is absolutely essential to the existence of our present form of government.

So far as I am advised neither lawyer nor statesman nor student of reputation for learning or ability has ever questioned that this limitation of the judicial power of the courts of the United States, both as to its extent in the subjects which it embraces and its extent in reference to the manner of its exercise, vitally concerns the perpetuity of our form of government. I will venture to say that no statesman, lawyer, civilian, or commentator of ability has ever questioned the fact that this Government cannot be perpetuated without the observance of the limitations of power upon the judiciary in the Constitution of the United States.

I shall assume, therefore, without further argument on this point, that if it shall be found that the judicial power of the United States as now exercised embraces subjects not embraced in the extent of its judicial power as prescribed in the organic law, and that the exercise of its judicial power is in a form not provided for in the Constitution, but in a prohibited form: that it is original and not appellate, and that it has been made original in the inferior courts and appellate in the inferior courts of the United States, over all courts not of the United States.

We shall be concerned first to inquire how this affects the future of our country and our institutions, and whether there may not be some wisdom in our diminishing rather than increasing the frequency and facility of the exercise of a judicial power prohibited by our organic law and foreign to the nature of our institutions. Until some legislation has been had to readjust and reconstruct this resistance to the fundamental law, this war upon the national life and the national authority, which, if we shall find it to be true, will be of more potency in the destruction of our National Government and its authority than many armed rebellions, because it will have attained that end which open war in vain sought to effect, it will have effectually destroyed so much of the constitutional and organic civil polity as provided that there should be local tribunals for the determination of local rights and interests, State courts and State Legislatures, charged with the duty of protecting the lives, liberty, and property of the people, and not subject to control except in a few specified cases, and as to these by the exercise of appellate power instead of original jurisdiction, and that by the Supreme and not by the inferior courts of the United States.

The statesman and the thoughtful student may well consider whether the transfer of this new and different extent of judicial power to a tribunal holding office for life, and appointed by and amenable to a central authority, will not effectually destroy the National Government as it now exists by destroying the State governments and all their autonomy.

I do not hesitate to affirm that in my opinion the Senator from Illinois would be among the last men to do anything that would affect the harmony of the several powers of our national Government, nor have I any reason to doubt that the President of the United States is animated by a just pride in the power and dignity of both the National Government as it is and of the several States with their separate powers subordinated to the just objects and power of the National Government.

But principles of government, indeed all moral causes, have their effects independent of our hopes and desires, and we must study and consider them in the light of their usual and customary effect, and if, indeed, the cause has already had an effect, if we may study it in the light of history, of actual experience, it is wise for us to do so. What then will be the effect upon the future of our National Government, on the people of the United States, of continuing the extent of judicial power of the courts of the United States, as now interpreted by the Supreme Court, both as to the subjects it embraces and the manner and form in which it is exercised? Have we any light thrown upon this subject in the history of the only life tribunal known to our laws.

In considering this subject I shall do it without imputation or reflection on any of the eminent men either in the past or the present who have belonged to the judicial system of the United States. I shall freely admit their eminent ability, their honesty of purpose, their conscientious convictions of right. The path of argument and reason is not in the line of personal invective and denunciation.

The question of the excellence of men takes no part in the question of the force and effect of specific moral causes. The fitness of principles or the facts of experience. What is the extent of the judicial power of the United States as now declared, and is it exercised as an original or appellate jurisdiction as concerns all courts which are not courts of the United States?

Surely this is an important question for the thoughtful statesman in the light not of party animadversion or of the hustings but in the light of reason and reflection, as Senators educated to consider moral and political causes and capable of legislating for the interests of a great people and the perpetuity of a great nation and a great Government. Let us consider this calmly and ascertain what is the extent and what the manner of the exercise of the judicial power of the United States.

Opening by chance the one hundred and third volume of the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the head of causes of removal, I find the following:

A life-insurance company of Missouri removes from a State court in Louisiana to the United States court a suit by a citizen of Louisiana against the corporation.

A writ of execution from a State court of Louisiana about to be enforced is removed into the United States circuit court, and all proceedings for its enforcement become void and of no effect on the filing of a petition by a citizen of another State.

A writ of replevin from a State court against a sheriff in possession of property under execution from a State court is transferred, on petition of a non-resident, to the circuit court of the United States, and thereafter and thereby the State court has no power.

The judgment of a State court is set aside as to the construction of a State law prescribing qualifications for jurors, is revised and set aside, on the ground that the judge in deciding that the exclusion of certain persons of the colored race from being jurors on the ground of the want of intelligence, experience, or moral integrity was a violent presumption because the practice had been uniform, and in 26,000 colored people in Delaware there must have been some who were qualified, and therefore this was a prima facie case of denial of a right secured by the Constitution, namely, a right to be tried by a jury, some of whom might have been selected from the same race—the African race.

We may be startled at this affirmation, but it is strictly true; although the court in their opinion affirm in words that a man has no right to be tried by a mixed jury, they do in terms affirm "that no colored citizen had ever been summoned as a juror in the courts of the State, although its population exceeded 20,000 in 1870 * * * in a total population of 150,000," and they say this fact "presented a prima facie case of denial by the State officers charged with the selection of grand and petit jurors of that equality of protection which has been secured by the laws of the United States." And the court set aside the judgment and directed further proceedings consistent with the opinion.

The court also say:

> The constitutional provision must therefore mean that no agency of the State, or of the officers or agents, by whom its powers are executed, shall deny to any person the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, therefore, by virtue of public position under a State government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State, and is clothed with the State's authority, his act is that of the State.

That is the language of the court. It will be seen that it forms a direct supervisory power over the action of governors, legislatures, even judicial officers. Courts have heretofore affirmed that the king can do no wrong; the impersonal sovereignty has only correct purposes. But our court holds the State can do no right; if any of her officers who by virtue of public position do wrong, it is the act and wrong of the State—poor State fallen from her former dignity. She sins both by omission and commission, both by intention and by ignorance, by action and non-action. She bears by imputation, like Adam's sons, the sins and the vices and not the virtues and righteousness of others, but there is no new covenant of grace for her redemption.

The great monarch, when he said in the consciousness of power and in the exultancy of pride, "the state is me," was not more absolute and imperious in haughty and unwarranted assertion than this reasoning of the court.

This affirmation of law, that the equal protection of the laws for any person requires a jury to be selected by State officers, not according to their qualities, but according to their race; that to select a juror without reference to race or color requires the non-exclusion of any race or color and the actual selection from all—that is, that there is a presumption of suitable qualities in the black race because of race and color, and in the given case no presumption in favor of suitable qualities in the white race—let us look at this proposition of the Supreme Court. A man is on trial for a hideous crime against the women of a community; a jury is impaneled of persons decided by the local judicial tribunal to be qualified—honest, impartial, intelligent. It is not denied that they possess these qualities. The record exhibited the judicial decision of this fact by the State judge. It is not asserted in the opinion of the court that this judicial action was erroneous or was contested as to the qualities of these jurors. Let us examine this inexact, this unconstitutional argument for the extension of power.

But it is said there were some black persons in the State who must be presumed (not proved) to have been qualified, and as these were not selected, the court say that this particular person was denied the equal protection of the laws, and the persons performing the duty according to the instruction of their own judicial authority and local tribunal were guilty of a crime against the laws of the United States, and subject to punishment in the courts of the United States. The particular question submitted to the court, by the nature of their judicial function, was to apply the Constitution and the law to this particular case.

That case and question were whether that person before them was denied the equal protection of the laws by having a jury selected who were impartial, honest, and intelligent, because other impartial, honest, and intelligent persons might have been selected from another race and color, and the court decide that he was. In this decision there are several important points. It asserts a power of correction and removal of all criminal cases subject to the cognizance of State courts under State laws in asserting that if jurors are not selected in the manner and from the race or color which the Supreme Court in their discretion shall decide to be proper, the verdict and the judgment shall be set aside by the exercise of the power of the court, either upon removal of the case, if within the statute, or under its appellate authority.

Secondly, it asserts in the judges of the inferior and superior courts of the United States a criminal jurisdiction, with a power of punishment over all State judges, sheriffs, governors, and legislators.

Mr. President, that proposition may perhaps be denied, but let the language of the court answer for itself. Let the fact answer that a State judge, so declared in the laws of the State of Virginia, in the exercise of the judicial power of the selection of a jury for the trial of a man for his life, furnished in one case the subject of a judicial examination and reversal by the Supreme Court; and in another case from the State of Virginia the subject of revision by the same court of the correctness and validity of an indictment under the laws of the United States found in the circuit court of Virginia, for the exercise of a duty which, though the court say was not a judicial duty, the laws of the State of Virginia, as decided by her courts, declared to be a judicial duty. I speak now of both the principle and express letter of the decision of the Supreme Court in Neal vs. Delaware, 13 Otto, 103 Supreme Court Reports. The court say:

> The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the State, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are executed, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, by virtue of public position under a State government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State, and is clothed with the State's authority, his act is that of the State. This must be, or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. (Neal vs. Delaware, 13 Otto, 397.)

If it be true, as it undeniably is, that the power of the Supreme Court was intended to be original in the specified cases and appellate in all other cases than those specified, if it be true that the State courts were to have jurisdiction and judicial power, not granted but reserved to the States, how can it be true that a judge may be indicted for the delivery of a judicial opinion in a case stated before him, whether it be in reference to a jury or in reference to any other question? I venture to say that there can be no answer to that proposition except by denying the fact that the duty is a judicial one and by asserting that since the adoption of the amendments there are no powers reserved to the States. I ask still further, if it be true in reference to those cases upon which the Constitution has not conferred an express jurisdiction, if there be anything reserved in the State authority, how are you going to conduct those governments with an unlimited and unreserved power, and if the reasoning be good, (whether it is good or bad does not matter to the proposition,) how can there be a State with legislative, executive, or judicial authority subject to the discretionary interpretation of their law and the punishment of their officers for the execution of their specific duties, according to their own laws, by any other tribunal?

Mr. President, what has been the history of the Supreme Court? I question not its eminence, its dignity, its conscientious purpose, but what in the light of the history of this country has been the history of the exercise of judicial power by the Supreme Court? I challenge discussion and investigation when I ask, according to it, its important part in the development of constitutional law to the political autonomy and character of our country, has there ever been a time in the history of this country, from the days of Judge Marshall until now, when the court was not the exponent of established power and policy according to the political opinions that prevailed at the time? What were the interpretations by Judge Marshall in the early days? What were the interpretations of this court of constitutional power under the pro-slavery interpretation of the powers of government? What was the Dred Scott case? How was it during the war? I remember one or two instances, one in which the eminent Senator from Illinois rendered himself illustrious, and will go down to posterity with the high and honorable character that justly belongs to him for relieving a man under sentence from a power which was denied in the Constitution and the law.

What shall we say? Do not all parties, do we not now in our discussions recognize the fact that a court holding power by a life tenure, let its judges be as able as they may, separated from the great body of the people in the necessary discharge of their high and important official duties, thrown into association only with, and dependent upon, the great officials who conduct the Government and exercise its great powers, separated from the sympathies and feelings which animate the great body of the country, take their color and tone from the political party in control of the Government for the purpose of establishing and carrying to an extreme the recognized policy and power of the Government?

For one I never believed, I do not believe now, that there ought to be in the Supreme Court anything more than what I conceive the Constitution intended—the power to adjudicate private rights. I believe with Mr. Lincoln that they are not and ought not to be the exponents of constitutional power for the other departments of the Government.

Shall we consider that class of crimes under the head of the elective franchises which is contained in the statutes? Will any lawyer, will any statesman undertake to defend the exhibitions that we have lately seen of Federal power, of jurors rising in an open court and denying that they had rendered a verdict, and a judge holding office by a life tenure saying in a case of crime, "I insist that that is your verdict," and against the protestation of the jurors in the court demanding a verdict which they in open court denied was their verdict?

Mr. President, I am not saying this for any purpose of invective;

I have none. There are two things that result from facts: they carry with them certain conclusions of their own; they demand certain consequences, and it is not to be said that we are assailing men. I do not know these men; I have no acquaintance with them; I have no personal feeling in the matter, and when I mention these facts I say they are matters which demand the consideration of Senators, of men who profess to deal in reason, in learning, in the history of nations, and a knowledge of the causes that are to perpetuate the existence of power and its exercise for the general welfare and the maintenance of all the ends of a high civilization.

I have no hesitation in affirming that let personal feeling or political feeling be what it may, it cannot control the great moral fact that there should be legislation to prevent and promptly remedy the act of a judge who, in open court, in a case of life and liberty of the citizen, overrules the protestation of the jury who are authorized to say whether or not they had rendered a verdict. I venture to say the history of the tribunals of the civilized world, outside of the celebrated Jeffreys, presents no parallel instance to this.

The abstract proposition which presents itself to the eye of reason for calm and temperate thought in the consideration of a bill that is to increase the facility and the frequency of the exercise of judicial power is to consider how these tribunals have acted, how in respect to the protection of the lives, liberties, and property of the people, its present interpretation of powers may be controlled and limited and reduced, to the end that its conscientious convictions, its learning may promote the public interest and the general welfare.

I am not unwilling to concede that within the just limitations of the Constitution their high judicial functions may be exercised in consistency with the preservation of the Government under which they hold their authority; but I affirm, and I believe there can be no meeting or questioning of the proposition, (I state it for purposes of examination,) that if there exists a power of removal in all cases in which in the discretion of the judges of the inferior courts of the United States there may be a denial of equal privileges and equal rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States, if an absolute power of suspending the action of every State judge and every State court exists in every judge of the United States who may see fit to say, "I decide," there is a denial or a threatened denial of some equal right, immunity, or privilege secured under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and if, when that case is removed the judge may say to the jury protesting that two or three or four or five or a majority of us have been coerced and intimidated in giving the verdict, this is your verdict notwithstanding your denial; if that be the law there is no longer any limit to the extent of the judicial power of the courts of the United States, either as to the subjects which are embraced in their jurisdiction or as to the manner in which that jurisdiction may be exercised; there is no longer any law to govern them: they are subject alone to the caprices of their own arbitrary and despotic will.

I ask, then, shall a life tribunal of nine or twelve or twenty-four or thirty-six judges, divided either into one Supreme Court or into an intermediate appellate court, be created? As I have said before, I would be willing to accept the idea of the Senator from Illinois and his eminent authority for the advantages of an intermediate appellate tribunal. I would not be unwilling to vote the President of the United States the power to nominate a reasonable number of judges. I do not desire to see eighteen new judges appointed for political purposes to remove causes into the United States courts by petition, mandamus, and habeas corpus, because there may have been jurors of another race and color who may have been qualified to sit in a given case and they were not selected. I think it would be asking too much of us to ask that, but I hope the President is capable of the honorable ambition of being the President of the United States, of doing right, of putting himself in accord with the great principles of civil liberty and of law that have existed from the first dawnings of jurisprudence, and that he would be willing to give assurance to the country of his willingness to limit and restrain the extent of judicial power, and his purpose that the judicial department shall be consecrated to the great ends of justice and civil liberty, and eliminated from the machinery of party success, and that his appointments would be made equally from the great political parties.

With such assurances I do not doubt that under the leadership of the Senator from Illinois, in whom the country has confidence, a bill might be matured that would satisfy all opinions. I do not speak, as I said, against the special features of this bill, which might easily be amended before its passage so as to meet all objections, but I think we had better pause and look into the subject of finding some means of limiting the extent of the judicial power of the courts of the United States and the manner in which it is exercised. We had better inquire whether there is any vestige left of authority in the State courts. We had better ask whether the judge, with a halter around his neck or the penitentiary door held open before him because he may give some opinion which may be afterward decided to be a violation of the equal rights of some other man, is capable of performing judicial functions. We had better inquire whether there can be any fair and just administration of justice or law under a judicial power of this extent and thus construed.

A life tribunal, either at the seat of government or scattered through the country, confined to an association at the seat of government with the great corporations who hold the industrial interests of the country in their hands, those great corporations who hold the power of taxation over transportation and production which have been committed to them by State authority, those who have amassed vast interests and properties, and who are privileged classes by contrast with the great body of the people, protected it may be from legislative power, either national or State, under the judicial interpretation of vested rights.

May we not well pause and inquire whether it may not be necessary to make some change in the extent of the power exercised by this tribunal, a tribunal charged with the adjudication of these vast moneyed interests and exercising what is more important, criminal jurisdiction and a power to punish through their subordinate tribunals all State judges, governors, legislators, and the judicial departments of the States for differences of opinion in the construction of the laws and for their official action? May we not wisely pause to consider these facts, if they are facts, and the consequences which will result from them? Is the statement true? Let the court again answer for itself in its own words. In the case of Neal vs. Delaware, reiterated with approval and reaffirmed as the law in the case of Virginia vs. Rives, the court say:

> We do not perceive how holding an office under a State and claiming to act for the State can relieve the holder from obligation to obey the Constitution of the United States or take away the power of Congress to punish his disobedience.

This affirms the criminality of every officer of a State who in their interpretation of what are equal rights differ in opinion from their judicial authority. I concur in the opinion of the court, much as I criticise this declaration, that whoever willfully violates the Constitution, whether State officer or otherwise, is subject to its authority and its penal provisions; but there can be no violation of the Constitution of the United States by the opinion of a judge judicially rendered upon a case made by parties before him, be it right or wrong. Never before in the history of mankind, that I am aware of, has it been affirmed that a judge, acting under the authority of a State in the exercise of a judicial power, was subject to punishment for the opinion he might declare and the decisions he has honestly made in cases submitted to him for judgment.

I am aware that the court in that case deny that the officer in the State of Virginia who made the selection of jurors was in performing that duty a judge, but the court in its opinion, denying not that he was a judge but that he was performing a judicial duty, undertakes to say that if in their judgment the judge of a State court shall perform that duty which they shall decide to be judicial, they will revise that decision and say that it was an erroneous one, and that in the act he performed he was not performing a judicial duty, but one for which he was criminally responsible.

But what are equal rights? Who can tell? In all the history of the country and its laws it was never heard before that among the civil rights was that of being a juror or a judge. I venture with great positiveness the opinion that never before in any case, in any commentary, by any just rule of reasoning, can it be affirmed, or has it ever been affirmed, that any man had a right per se, that it was among his civil rights, to be a juror or a judge in a given case.

Shall a person accused of crime be held to have among his equal rights that of having jurors of a particular race and color not excluded from the list of possible selection for jurors, and is the judge of a State court to be held subject to indictment and guilty of the offense because he excluded and failed to select—for that is the language of the indictment—as grand and petit jurors certain citizens of African race and color, such citizens possessing all other qualifications prescribed by law and being by him excluded from such jury list made out by him as such judge (this is the indictment which has been sustained by the supreme judicial authority of the country) on account of their race, color, and previous condition of servitude, and for no other reason? The offense is the exclusion because of race, color, and prejudice? This was an offense of intention or motive. The special act on which it arose and by which it is proved as stated in the indictment was that he did then and there exclude and fail to select as grand and petit jurors. The failure to select is at once the criminal act and proof of the criminal intent. Yet how many other citizens of the white race, possessing all the qualifications required by law, were necessarily excluded from the jury list by the decisions of the judges under the laws of Virginia and Delaware!

Here is the exercise of judicial power by a judge in the construction of a statute law, and, if you please, of the Constitution of the United States, which by his oath of office he is required to do, for both are the subjects of his judicial cognizance, not revised by the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, but by the novel and extraordinary method for which this bill makes no provision, of directing the judge to be convicted and sentenced under an indictment. There was an exercise of judicial power that no lawyer, no reasoning man, can find any ground whatever for justifying; a power by which the court undertook to revise and correct the action of a State court by declaring that the judge should be held subject to indictment and imprisonment and conviction of a criminal offense arising in and by the judicial act.

Mr. President, I state only the truth without the least exaggeration. I do not do it for any party or political purpose. I should not be averse to the features of this bill which the Senator from Illinois has reported. I should be willing to accept upon his eminent authority the intermediate appellate jurisdiction of the court. I should be willing to vote to the President of the United States the nomination of a reasonable number of judges, but I wish for myself to point out objections urged by reason and by argument, and if these propositions are not true I desire them to be corrected, for I recognize that it is the office of the Senate and the duty of Senators to make calm, dispassionate, and mutual statements of opinion and thought upon legislative subjects, to the end that each may have its proper weight, force, and effect.

I do not think this exercise of judicial power as declared by the Supreme Court in the case of The State of Virginia vs. Rives and Neal vs. Delaware is consistent with the preservation of the liberties of the people and the rights of the States, the perpetuity of the Union or the reputation of the judiciary. Here was a case which presented two questions, one a judicial one, the other a legislative subject. The judicial question was whether the trial of an accused person by a jury of intelligent and impartial persons selected judicially with reference to fitness and without contest as to the facts, a selection of jurors judicially by a State court, and so adjudged and declared by it, for there is no contesting the fact in the record, whether such a judicial act by a State tribunal is a denial of the equal protection of the laws to the accused person. Certainly no one could directly so affirm.

A man cannot stand in court on trial for crime and by his counsel say, "I acknowledge that these jurors have been selected for their fitness, for their impartiality, for their honesty. I acknowledge that the judgment of this court affirming these jurors to be good and true men is correct and true, but I say had the list of selection been allowed to contain other persons there might have been of another race and color other men selected for my trial, therefore I say that I am denied the equal protection of the laws." That was the precise case before the court. That was the precise action of the accused person and his counsel, and the State court solemnly adjudicated the fact that the accused person was being tried by impartial, honest, intelligent jurors selected for that purpose, and that there was no denial of equal rights; but the Supreme Court of the United States have affirmed that because Delaware had been a slave State and for years had excluded colored men from the jury, because there had been no actual selection of them for the jury upon that trial and none had been placed upon the list, therefore there was a denial of the equal protection of the laws in the given case, and they reversed the action of the court.

Another question presented in that case was whether the possible exclusion of certain persons of another race and color from the list of selection by the decisions of the persons charged with the duty of selection under the State law was sufficiently protected by legislation, and the question whether such possible exclusion from the jury-box would not be better secured by positive law either of the United States or of the State requiring their actual selection. That was not the way the court stated it, but that was unquestionably the only other question. No one could say that the man upon trial had been deprived of the equal protection of the laws by being tried by intelligent, impartial, and honest jurors. That proposition would not do.

The real question was whether the State of Delaware should have abrogated by specific enactment this exclusion, not relying upon the paramount force and effect of the Constitution of the United States. Yet we find that the court had no hesitation in doing—what? In exercising legislative power. And it had no hesitation in giving it a post facto criminal effect, for beyond all doubt or controversy the Supreme Court of the United States, whose members I do not impeach, whose ability I admit, but considered by the record, in that case they said that the judge who had performed that judicial duty without any previous decision even of the court was guilty of a criminal act. I say this was the exercise of a legislative power and giving to it a post facto criminal effect, punishing as a crime an act committed before the crime was declared by the Supreme Court exercising legislative power.

Mr. President, I ask the question calmly and for reflection. If I am wrong I desire to be corrected. I have read these reports; I have read the language of the court. If it does not cover the case as I state it I desire to be corrected. If it does cover it, if it affirms the right in the inferior courts of the United States to remove by the exercise of any of its writs, by appeal or summary order, causes criminal and civil pending in the State courts and to decide by a judgment of the court subsequently rendered upon a new construction of the statute of the United States that the judge to whom the State had committed the judicial power was criminally guilty for the opinions rendered, then I say if States and State judicial tribunals and State laws are to perform any part in the civil polity of this country the first and imperative duty of every reasoning man is to assert that by law these State courts and State officers shall be protected and not subjected to the unrestricted power of the United States courts. This proposition cannot be met otherwise than by the calm and just and learned treatment of it upon the basis of facts.

Mr. President, is there no reason, then, why we should be careful in increasing the efficiency and the facility for the exercise of such judicial powers—powers so dangerous and destructive not alone to the autonomy of the States, but to the just exercise of the powers of the National Government, for I venture to say that if the principle established in Virginia vs. Rives be true the Federal courts from the highest to the lowest may decide that a State judge is not performing a judicial duty in the exercise of any functions and hold him responsible criminally for his opinion? If that be true, then I say the power which can so decide is the supreme power and not one of the co-ordinate powers of this Government, and that if it is a life tribunal every certainty in the future is that with the vast increasing accumulation of wealth and fortune, with the vast power of the privileged classes, a life tribunal dominating with absolute and supreme power upon all questions of constitutional interpretation, it does not need the eye of a very profound student of human affairs to see that the political forces which were so wisely conceived, so wisely adjusted, have lost their balance and that the country will go forward, notwithstanding its increasing greatness and prosperity, in a new career of development of power.

I ask again is there not an absolute necessity for those of us who are sworn to defend and preserve the Constitution of the United States and the exercise of power, judicial, executive, and legislative, as therein contained, to pause and consider well what steps we may take in order to prevent the further increase of this power and to limit it to the ends, the causes, and the purposes provided in our original Constitution?

Mr. President, I have made these remarks with reluctance. It is not my purpose to antagonize the provisions of this bill. I have said before that I believe the supreme appellate power should exist as to the law and the facts of the case. I believe the path of appeal should be made easy. I believe that the Supreme Court of the country should be accessible to any interest involving a question of life and of liberty. I am not averse to the intermediate appellate tribunal. I am willing to vote the President a reasonable number of judges, but in my judgment and opinion we should not fix without further consideration eighteen new judges without any guaranty that the President will appoint them as the President of the people of the United States, and not for political purposes as partisans, for we cannot fail to remember, cover it as we may, that the decisions of this tribunal have destroyed all the preconceived ideas of constitutional right and of individual liberty that we have heretofore had.

I say to put this power of eighteen new judges if it is to be for political purposes, to make a bureau nominally for the administration of justice but really for the promotion of party success, is not to the interest of either one side or the other. I am willing to believe that the President will not do it, but let us first restrict the vast power of this judicial tribunal. Let us preserve the vitality of the States as well as of the National Government. Let us prevent the recurrence of such scenes as the papers have reported here of a judge demanding from a jury a verdict of conviction and refusing to hear their protest that they have not rendered such a verdict.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire before the vote is taken upon this bill to submit some observations which have occurred to me and which have convinced my judgment that this bill ought not to pass. The Senator from Illinois invites us in the last speech which he made to consider the system which the bill proposes to inaugurate. I propose to consider that system. I think it is a vicious system, one not calculated either to promote the administration of justice or the welfare of the people.

I object to the system because if inaugurated it will tend to increase the uncertainty now so great in the administration of the law. As I understand the bill, we are to have nine appellate tribunals sitting in the nine circuits into which the Union is divided, and each one of these courts is to be supreme in cases under $10,000 in fixing the law. What will be the result? With nine separate tribunals having jurisdiction in the last resort, not liable to be revised or corrected up to the amount of $10,000, what guarantee will we have that the court sitting in the first circuit will not decide the same question differently from the decision which will be made in the second circuit, or the third circuit, or any other circuit? We have none, sir.

Then, again, we have circuit and district courts whose judgments are final in all cases up to the amount of $500, and that presents this kind of a system to the people of the United States: First, in one class of cases the circuit and district courts are final; they may decide as they please and there is no means of correcting them. Then come the circuit courts, and they may decide as they please, and differ from each other, and there is no means of correcting them except in certain cases. And then we have the Supreme Court of the United States, which may decide differently from all these. To show that this is not a trivial objection, I beg leave to refer to the remarks made by the Senator from Illinois on the 1st day of May upon this bill. He then said:

> The only objection that I have heard seriously urged in regard to the appellate jurisdiction which the bill confers and limits is, that the court of appeals in the different circuits may rule differently upon the same question in cases where less than $10,000 is involved, and that the question cannot be determined by the Supreme Court. It is supposed that confusion and uncertainty would result from such conflicting decisions, and that irreparable mischief may ensue.

How does he answer that objection? Does he say that it is not a valid objection? Does he undertake to show to the Senate and to the country that by some sort of legal or judicial legerdemain not known to mankind at large these nine separate, distinct appellate courts would be able to arrive at the same conclusion upon the same question? No, sir; he admits the validity and the force of the objection; and his answer is this:

The same objection, however, is equally applicable to the appellate jurisdiction exercised by the Supreme Court under existing laws where the subject-matter in controversy is of less value than $5,000.

He admits that the objection exists, but says that it is no greater than that under which we already suffer.

Mr. President, I think it was the duty of so learned a body as the Judiciary Committee, composed of the ablest members of the legal profession who are members of this body, acknowledging and seeing this fatal and serious objection to exist in the jurisprudence of the country, in forming a new system, in framing a new bill, to have devoted some time, some of their great talents, some of their great acquirements, to removing the difficulty, instead of confessing, as was done by the Senator from Illinois, that the evil exists, but that it is no greater than it was before. My idea of a bill to reform the judicial system of this country would include a provision which would cure so obvious and so serious an objection.

There are other objections to this bill which have been pointed out by gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who have discussed it and which I do not propose to repeat now. I object to the bill mainly upon the ground that it is ill-timed. It was confessed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] yesterday, it was confessed also by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] and I understand it to have been confessed by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] that there is need of a provision for reducing or diminishing the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. I understood the Senator from Kansas to admit that the extension of this jurisdiction, some of it by law and some usurped, had operated in producing immeasurable wrong upon the people of this country.

My idea would be when the complaint is made, when the necessity for the passage of this bill is based entirely upon the ground that the present judicial force of the United States is insufficient to discharge the business of these courts, it would have been the proper preliminary inquiry to ascertain first how much jurisdiction could be eliminated and how much then would remain to be discharged and performed by the courts of the United States; and when we had ascertained that, then to have seen whether there was a necessity for the increase in the number of judges.

The Judiciary Committee have committed this fault. They have made a provision for a state of affairs which they admit ought not longer to exist. They admit they have been considering the question of lessening or diminishing the jurisdiction of these courts, and while it is so obvious that this question should be determined before we act on this bill, yet they neglect that and ask us to pass this measure for the purpose of creating additional courts to do work which they admit ought to be diminished. I say they have commenced at the wrong end of this matter. They propose to put out an immense plant to do the work without first ascertaining what the work is that needs to be done.

Suppose we pass this bill; suppose we create these nine new courts, with the expectation that afterward we will undertake to diminish the jurisdiction of these courts, what will be the effect? It will be, if not impossible, at least very difficult to pass any law through Congress by which one single iota of the jurisdiction of these courts shall be taken from them; all the judges will be against it. Are we now to make eighteen more judges, whose influence and that of their friends will be brought to bear to preserve intact a jurisdiction which, by only being thus preserved intact, can justify their appointment and existence?

I say to the friends of the proposition to reduce the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, if you pass this bill you will have added another to the very serious obstacles which lie in your path. Therefore I am opposed to the bill on that ground.

Sir, I am opposed to the bill in one of its details upon another ground. As explained by its authors, the bill is a false pretense. It professes to do that which it does not do. I have heard it stated on this floor in advocacy of the bill that it brought justice to the homes and bosom of the people. Let us see how that is. In the district in which I reside, extending from the western line of South Carolina to the eastern line of New Mexico, we have one appellate court sitting at the city of New Orleans, over five hundred miles from the eastern boundary of the district and probably more than that distance from its western boundary. Is it bringing justice to the homes and bosom of the people when you require a citizen of Georgia or a citizen of Texas to go five hundred miles for the purpose of having an appeal heard which now under the law can be heard in many instances in his own State? It brings the administration of justice to the homes and bosom only of the people of the city of New Orleans. The same objection applies to other circuits. If it is to be the system to have these intermediate appellete courts, let us have them in every State in the Union, and not only in every State, but in every district of the Union, and there will then be some pretense for the claim that justice is being brought home to the people.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me a moment to present some statistics germane to the subject of which he is speaking?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I have made a calculation of the population of the different circuits, and I wish to present that to the Senator from Mississippi in order that he may comment upon it if he chooses to do so. In the first circuit, the States of Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Maine, with the court at Boston, the population is 3,085,000; in the second circuit, the States of Vermont, Connecticut, and New York, with the court at New York, the population is 6,468,000; in the third circuit, the States of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, with the court at Philadelphia, the population is 5,560,000; in the fourth circuit, consisting of Maryland, West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina, with the court at Richmond, the population is 5,461,000; in the fifth circuit, consisting of Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, with the court at New Orleans, the population is 5,844,000; in the sixth circuit, consisting of Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky, and Tennessee, with the court at Cincinnati, the population is 8,011,000; in the seventh circuit, consisting of Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin, with the court at Chicago, the population is 6,371,000; in the eighth circuit, consisting of Nebraska, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, and Colorado, with the court at Saint Louis, the population is 5,393,000; in the ninth circuit, consisting of California, Oregon, and Nevada, with the court at San Francisco, the population is 1,402,000; so that the population varies in these different circuits as much as 5,000,000. The point I make is that in organizing appellate courts it would be scarcely necessary to appoint two judges for the ninth circuit, while it might be necessary to appoint as many as three judges for the sixth circuit. The distribution of these courts, in other words, in respect to population is entirely unequal.

Mr. GEORGE. The remarks made by the Senator from Alabama on these statistics, showing the inequality of these circuits, render any further comment from me unnecessary.

Mr. President, I propose to make a little inquiry as to the possibility and feasibility of eliminating the jurisdiction of the Federal courts without objection, without doing any injury to any one. In the first place, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the argument made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] a few days ago, in which he demonstrated that the jurisdiction of the United States courts, dependent upon the citizenship of the parties so far as it related to corporations, was a usurped jurisdiction. I propose to read something upon that subject which was alluded to by my friend from Arkansas but was not read by him. I read now from Curtis's Courts of the United States. Curtis says:

I will now proceed to the further consideration of the parties over whom the courts of the United States under this eleventh section have jurisdiction. One of the most important and difficult questions on the subject of parties, which has been almost constantly before the Supreme Court of the United States during the last quarter of a century, is the question of jurisdiction over corporations. This eleventh section deals only with citizens, and it has been from first to last admitted that corporations are not citizens. They are political beings created by the law, and cannot sustain the character of citizens.—Curtis's Courts of the United States, page 127.

According to any rule of constitutional construction with which I am acquainted, with the announcement thus made there would seem to be an end of the claim on the part of the courts of the United States to exercise jurisdiction over corporations in virtue of their citizenship, but that has not been the result of the acknowledged principle that corporations are not citizens. The court has been vexing itself, says Judge Curtis, for twenty-five years in order to acquire that which the Constitution did not give it, a jurisdiction over corporations under this section of the Constitution. "It is admitted," says Judge Curtis, "from the first to the last, that they are not citizens," and yet I will venture to say that one-half the cases now pending in the Federal courts whose jurisdiction is dependent upon the citizenship of the parties proceed upon the idea that corporations are citizens.

It is plain that there is a very great growth of the business in the Federal courts. No wonder when this large amount of their business is composed of cases to which corporations are parties, and when that jurisdiction is admitted to be without foundation in the Constitution and laws of the land. I read further from Judge Curtis:

I suppose it may fairly be said that neither the framers of the Constitution nor the framers of the judiciary act had corporations in view.

When it is admitted that in virtue of this clause of the Constitution the Federal courts have no jurisdiction over corporations the simple-minded man would inquire, how is it that one-half of their business, one-half of the time consumed in dispensing it, is devoted to cases in which corporations are parties in virtue of their alleged citizenship? That answer is furnished in the same book from which I have read.

In the first place, it was thought to be a very convenient thing that these corporations should be subject to the jurisdiction of the United States courts, and because it was convenient—not because it was constitutional—because it was convenient, in opposition to the Constitution, in opposition admittedly to the Constitution, the United States courts yet took jurisdiction; and how did they take it? I will read a little further from this same book. Judge Curtis says it is acquired on a fiction.

Now, what is a fiction? I know of no other definition for it than this: A falsehood; something which does not exist. The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over corporations is founded upon a fiction; upon a falsehood; upon a presumed fact which does not exist, and which the courts will not allow the adverse party to controvert. In fixing up a system for the Federal court business, in arranging for the disposition of the enormous business which has accumulated in them, would it not be the first and the highest duty of the Congress to inquire whether or not the business in those courts is legitimately there? Are we called upon by our oaths to support the Constitution, to furnish new courts, new judges, new marshals, new clerks, new facilities, for the purpose of enabling the courts to perform and discharge a jurisdiction admitted to be outside of and contrary to the Constitution? I think not, sir.

Again, Mr. President, there is another jurisdiction of the United States courts which, though constitutional, which, though entirely in accordance with the laws and the Constitution of the land, is yet of that character that it might be better performed and discharged by the State courts. I should like to know if there is any reason for the trial of suits between citizens of different States and depending upon the State law alone for their determination in the Federal courts rather than in the State courts. Let me illustrate. A contract is made in the State of Massachusetts, between citizens of Massachusetts to be performed in Massachusetts. The validity, the nature, and the obligation of that contract, all are to be judged by the laws of Massachusetts; and yet, sir, if one of those parties removes out of the State, or if he assigns that contract, it being a promissory note, to another party outside of the State, the jurisdiction of the courts of Massachusetts is ousted or may be ousted at the option of the holder of the paper, and all these questions are then to be litigated in the Federal courts.

Is there any good reason for that? Are the courts of Massachusetts incompetent to decide upon their own laws? Are they too corrupt to administer justice to non-residents against one of their own citizens? You must answer one of these questions in the affirmative, or else there is no good reason for depriving the courts of Massachusetts of the jurisdiction of deciding on the validity of a contract which was made within her borders, and which is admittedly to be determined by her laws.

And right here, Mr. President, I would remark that that provision of the judiciary act which requires the Federal courts to decide according to the laws of the States where they are applicable was wholly unnecessary. Every court in Christendom, wherever it may be situated, charged with passing upon the obligation of a contract, upon its nature and its validity, or upon the damages to be recovered for the non-performance of it, must decide according to the law of the place at which the contract was made.

It was admitted by the learned Senator from Illinois that one of the great troubles of properly discharging the business of the Federal courts was that the judges were not familiar with the State laws which they were called upon to administer. You discard the State courts, you discard the State judges, you erect a new jurisdiction composed of judges who it is admitted are not familiar with the laws which they are called upon to administer. Had we not better correct that?

It is said, however, that the State courts will not hold the scales of justice with fairness between their own citizens and non-residents. Let us see how that is. Is there any Senator upon this floor who is willing to arise in his seat now and say that a non-resident of his State cannot get a fair and impartial trial in the State courts against one of its own citizens? I ask any Senator, I ask every Senator here to answer that question. Is there any Senator who is conscious that justice cannot be administered in the courts of his State in favor of non-residents? No man will say so. Then, sir, I have the testimony of every Senator on this floor to the fact that fair and impartial trials can be had in the State courts where one of the parties is a non-resident and where another is not.

Here, Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to a trial that took place in his State soon after the war which illustrates my position on this subject.

In the year 1866, just after the war, when cotton was worth thirty or forty cents a pound, there was a disposition on the part of Northern men to come South and buy plantations and raise cotton. Among the gentlemen who thus came were two from Massachusetts, one a large manufacturer, as I understood; the other was a general of high repute in the Federal Army. They came to the county in which I then resided and bought a large plantation. They paid a large sum of money down in cash and left a considerable sum unpaid. The seasons were bad, no cotton was made, the freedmen did not work as well as was expected, and the result was a failure in 1866, a failure in 1867, a failure in 1868, and an inability on the part of the purchasers to pay the balance of the purchase-money. A suit was brought upon the notes for the balance of the purchase-money. They were sent to a Mr. A. A. RANNEY, I believe a member of the other House of Congress, for collection by the Mississippi holders. He brought suit upon them. He did not bring the suits in the Federal courts, but he brought them in the State courts in Boston, where one of the defendants resided. There was a plea of fraud in the sale, false representations as to the value of the land. The parties had already paid really more than the land was worth. Witnesses were examined; the defendants were examined. There was cross-swearing in the case. The jury, composed of Masschusetts citizens, were compelled to decide upon the credibility and weight to be given to the testimony of the Massachusetts defendants, one of whom, as I said before, was a general of honorable fame in the war and then holding, I believe, a high Federal office. The plaintiffs were Mississippians and were rebels. The jury weighed the testimony, and the verdict was not in accordance with the passions and prejudices of the people of Massachusetts, but was in favor of the plaintiffs. Judgment was rendered against the defendants for the full amount, and it operated to their destruction financially, as I understood, and the court on a motion for a new trial approved the verdict. Is that an evidence that the State courts cannot administer justice between its own citizens and citizens of another State?

But, sir, there is a subsequent history to that case which I will also relate. A question arose as to whether the judgment in that case had been paid or whether it had been fraudulently assigned to another party. The Mississippian had another claim against Massachusetts citizens. If the judgment was paid then they had that property there out of which they could make their Mississippi debt. If it was only assigned then the property there was liable first to this assigned judgment. I was counsel in that case. I brought the suit. I corresponded with Mr. RANNEY. He believed that the judgment had been paid, and that the assignment was fraudulent, and on his belief and the circumstantial evidence which he gave me I brought the suit. I took his testimony; I took other testimony, and I thought I had a strong case of circumstantial evidence to show that the judgment had been satisfied and that the assignment was fraudulent. I succeeded in convincing the chancery court of Mississippi that such was the fact. The parties took it to the supreme court of the State, composed of men two of whom succeeded to that bench after what was called the revolution of 1875, and they unanimously decided that however suspicious the case might be, the fraud was not made out, and they decided in favor of the Massachusetts parties.

So here are two cases, one in Massachusetts, where the question was one of fraud and there was contradictory evidence, and that was decided in favor of the Mississippian, and one in Mississippi of the same character, and that was decided in favor of the Massachusetts man, both in the State courts.

And now, sir, is there any reason why this large mass of jurisdiction, dependent upon the citizenship of the parties, in which are involved alone—I want that understood—the construction, the meaning, the force, and the validity of State laws, shall be taken from the State tribunals, from the judges who are familiar with those laws, and, according to the admission of the Senator from Illinois, given to a foreign tribunal, constituted of men who are not familiar with the laws which they are called upon to administer?

Mr. HOAR. As the Senator from Mississippi did me the honor to call my attention to the statement he was about to make, I desire to inquire if his argument is directed to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Does he propose to reconsider or revise the constitutional provision on this subject?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; I know the Constitution declares that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to controversies between citizens of different States. I know also that the courts have decided over and over again that no jurisdiction is conferred on them by the Constitution, only by the acts of Congress passed in pursuance of it; and I know also that the very first act that was ever passed upon that subject fixed a minimum sum under which parties could not sue in the Federal courts, and I only propose to make that minimum sum larger in these cases. That is all.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will permit an observation, it strikes me that his argument is just this: the Constitution of the United States proceeded upon the ground, first, that there was danger in many cases which might arise under the local laws that citizens of other States than the States where these cases arose might not receive fair treatment at the hands of the State tribunals.

Mr. GEORGE. I think you are right about that.

Mr. HOAR. Second, that whether there was such danger or not, that was the belief likely to prevail in the minds of litigants who lost their causes in the courts of a State of which they were not citizens, and that the public satisfaction with the administration of justice, and the administration of justice in fact, would be likely to be subserved by giving this jurisdiction between citizens of different States to national tribunals, who of course would be expected to make themselves masters sufficiently of the local law. Now, is it any argument against that position to say that there have been cases, or even that as a rule in all cases the local tribunals are honest?

Now, let me state a case to the Senator from Mississippi. A little while before the war, about 1856 perhaps—I do not remember the exact year—there was a runaway slave, or a person alleged to be a runaway slave, who made his escape from New Orleans on a ship bound to Massachusetts, which came into one of our smaller ports south of Boston. The slave went over the side of the ship in a boat when a boat went ashore, and was discovered by the master of the ship, from whom he had been concealed up to that time, and he was pursued by another boat and taken back to the ship, kept there till the ship returned to New Orleans, and restored to slavery. Probably there was not an occurrence which could have stirred to its depths the indignation of the hearts of the people of Massachusetts more than the taking of that man out of their waters; close to the harbor of Plymouth I think it occurred; and on his next return that master was indicted under a Massachusetts statute for kidnapping. He had no authority from the owner of the slave in New Orleans; and the court to try the indictment was held by Chief-Justice Charles Allen, who was the leader, the organizer of the political anti-slavery party, the Republican party, a gentleman who, being a Massachusetts delegate at Philadelphia when General Taylor was nominated, declared the Whig party dissolved, and seceded from the convention because they refused to resolve in favor of prohibiting slavery in the Territories.

The jury was taken from a community of Abolitionists, as they would have been called by the people in the part of the country to which my honorable friend belongs. The question was submitted to that jury on the evidence, under the direction of Chief-Justice Allen, whether this party indicted for kidnapping was within or without the jurisdictional line. It being a disputed question in the minds of jurists and law-writers whether the jurisdictional line of the State extended from headland to headland of the little creek or sound where this thing happened or whether it extended a marine league from the shore, the judge directed the jury to take the most restricted view of the jurisdiction of the State, and upon that question that jury acquitted that man. I suppose every one of them would have given $5,000 out of his own pocket to have sent him to the state-prison at that time; but they acquitted him, and he went his way.

That is another illustration, and a very strong one, of what the Senator from Mississippi has already said; but suppose in that question of doubtful evidence and of doubtful law there had been a conviction of that Louisiana shipmaster, an honest, reasonable, suitable conviction, would not the whole State of Louisiana have believed that the man had been convicted in consequence of the prejudices of the tribunal to which his case had been submitted, and would it not have been better on the whole, if a conviction had been required by the law, that it should have happened in a Federal court? Of course I put this merely as an illustration, because being a criminal cause of course it could not have been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. It was not a case within the Federal jurisdiction at all. I simply present it as showing, if it could have been transferred to a Federal court by reason of some constitutional question, that if we are to maintain the mutual respect and affection which is required to make the people of this country in different sections live in harmony, it is not merely enough that there should be a just administration of justice, but the people should know and be sure that in those cases which excite feeling there is a just administration. The national tribunals belong to the whole country, and should assert their authority.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I acknowledge the force of the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts that justice should not only be fairly administered, but that the public should believe and acknowledge that it is fairly administered. But, sir, I do not think, giving the suggestion all the weight it is entitled to, that it authorizes us to keep the minimum of Federal jurisdiction in cases of contract, civil suits, at the sum now fixed by law. I deem it very important, as the Senator from Massachusetts has suggested, that there should be mutual good will and confidence between the different States with reference to the administration of justice. I think every citizen who has a claim to be enforced in any tribunal should have, so far as possible, absolute faith and conviction that ihe will have his case tried fairly and impartially. But the law as t now stands does not give in all cases that absolute conviction. If a citizen of Massachusetts has a claim against a citizen of Rhode Island for $499, he cannot sue in a Federal court. He with his small sum must submit to live and the public must submit to live in the conviction or suspicion that that man's case has not had a fair and impartial trial.

I think, sir, that the law as we have it now on the statute-book is founded upon a presumption false in fact, and I would have it so changed as to make the jurisdiction of the Federal court, instead of being founded on a false presumption, to depend upon the fact itself. As it now stands every man who is a non-resident of a State may sue in the United States courts if his claim is over $500, upon the legal presumption, contrary to the fact, that he cannot get a fair and impartial trial in the State courts in which such cases are generally tried.

Why cannot we enact that he shall bring his suit in the State court, and if he can make it out to the satisfaction of a Federal judge as a question of fact to be tried by evidence and not by mere false presumption, that he cannot get a fair and impartial trial in the State court, it shall be removed to the Federal court? And I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if a law of that sort were passed, giving it to the Federal judge to decide whether there was local influence or prejudice to prevent the impartial administration of justice, would it not be better for all sides than to vest the jurisdiction upon a presumption which there is not a Senator in this room now who is not willing to say is false so far as his own State is concerned?

Mr. HOAR. Would not that require the judge to convict an entire community, if not of a disposition, of a liability to do injustice?

Mr. GEORGE. Have you no law in your State allowing the State judges to make a change of venue from one county to another on account of local prejudice?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly. That does require a judge to convict an entire community; but that is a very unusual case. I do not now remember in the history of my State a single instance of the exercise of that authority for the change of venue on account of the impossibility of a fair trial.

Mr. GEORGE. I have seen many in mine; but is it not better, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts, for a judge upon sworn testimony before him to convict a community of a disposition to do injustice and to be unfair than it is for the legislation of the country, without any trial, however fair, however impartial the community may be, to convict them of the same offense? That is what we do by the law as it now is.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me, in answer to the honorable Senator's question, that it comes back to an arraignment of the Constitution of the United States. That is the answer to his proposition. The Constitution of the United States provides that in causes between citizens of different States the Federal tribunals shall have jurisdiction. Of course the jurors are drawn from the locality. It is merely the jurisdiction of the judge. In most causes the judge who sits at the trial comes from the locality where exceptions are taken to a higher court taken from all parts of the country. The Senator seems to be arguing a question left to the jurisdiction of Congress as to the limit of amount which shall make it worth while to have the Federal jurisdiction attach. That of course must be settled by Congress; but he seems to say, "We must make the amount as high as possible because the Constitution itself is wrong." His argument seems to me to come to that.

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir. It is well settled, as I remarked before, that the Constitution confers no jurisdiction on the courts. Every Federal court that undertakes to exercise any power of jurisdiction must put its finger upon an act of Congress passed in pursuance of the Constitution giving the jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the Constitution is not a jurisdiction to the court. It is not self-executing. It is a mere power granted to Congress to fix and define jurisdiction, and unless the Senator from Massachusetts can make it out that fixing $500 as a minimum of jurisdiction in a Federal court is in accordance with the Constitution, and fixing $5,000 is in violation of the Constitution, he has failed in the position which he has taken. The Constitution fixes no amount; that is left to Congress, and when that is done it is well settled that Congress may fix it in its discretion.

Now, Mr. President, having disposed of that, having shown, as I think, by the testimony of every Senator on this floor that the present law is unnecessary, because no man has risen and said that a fair trial cannot be had in his State, I want to address a few observations before I take my seat in favor of allowing the State courts to decide these causes.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi if he has reached a point in his remarks where it would be convenient for him to yield to me to make a motion that we go into executive session or adjourn? ["Adjourn!"] Before we do either, I wish to ask the Senate to pass a little appropriation bill. Does the Senator wish to complete his remarks this evening?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not care. I am willing to yield.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I ask the Senator to give way until we can have this bill laid informally aside for the purpose of passing a joint resolution which I am authorized to report.

Mr. GEORGE. I am willing to suspend now and go on in the morning.

Mr. MORGAN. Before this matter is laid aside I desire to submit a motion to recommit this bill with instructions, which I have drawn up and which I will ask to have printed in the RECORD for the convenience of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is to recommit the bill with instructions, which will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That Senate bill No. 420, now under consideration, be committed again to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to said committee to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, a bill to establish a court of appeals, inferior to the Supreme Court, which shall be composed of not exceeding nine circuit judges in addition to the nine circuit judges who are now in office, and which shall define the appellate and supervisory jurisdiction of said court, and shall also confer the power upon the judges of such appellate court to hold circuit courts in any circuit or district of the United States to which they shall respectively be assigned by the Chief Justice or the Supreme Court; and also to make any changes in existing laws, or any new provisions of law that may be necessary in consequence of the creation of such court of appeals, or that will contribute to the relief of the Supreme Court and any of the circuit courts from the embarrassment resulting from an undue accumulation of cases upon their dockets; and will give to persons convicted of crimes against the United States the right to a writ of error to the Supreme Court or to such court of appeals as said committee may be of opinion will best secure the rights of such persons and of the Government in the administration of justice; and will curtail and regulate the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States in respect of suits by and against corporations, and the removal of causes; and in such other respects as said committee shall recommend.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I should like to have some understanding when we may take a vote. If the motion of the Senator from Alabama prevails, of course it will be the end of the bill; but on the supposition that it will not prevail, that a majority of the Senate has indicated by its vote that it is in favor of this bill, I would like my friends on the other side, who are opposing the bill with so much bitterness and ability, to agree to take a vote to-morrow at some time. We have been discussing it nearly two weeks. There is a great deal of other important business in the Senate to be acted on. A great many persons think that this bill has occupied more than its share of the attention of the Senate. I would be very glad if the Senate would agree on some time at which a vote may be taken on this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Why not take a vote on the bill to-morrow?

Mr. HOAR. Why not to-night?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If the Senate is willing to vote to-night, I am ready to agree to it. The Senator from Alabama, the Senator from Mississippi, the two Senators from Florida, and the Senator from South Carolina have manifested more interest in opposition than others, and if they will agree I am pretty certain the rest of the Senate will consent to name some time for taking the vote. I should be glad to have it now, but still I am willing to wait until to-morrow if my friends will agree to that.

Mr. BUTLER. So far as I am concerned, I am sure I have taken up very little time of the Senate in discussing this bill. I am opposed to it and expect to vote against it; but I have not made any opposition simply for the sake of consuming time. It seems to me that all the discussion that has taken place upon it has been very desirable.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not want to enter into that matter.

Mr. BUTLER. As far as I am concerned, I have no disposition to postpone a vote upon it one moment beyond what I conceive to be required for the fair, legitimate discussion of the questions involved. I only speak for myself.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I appeal to the Senators from Alabama and Mississippi.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Mississippi has just announced, at the request of the Senator from Iowa, that he was willing to suspend his remarks in order that the Senator from Iowa might make a motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not ask to have a vote to-night.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the Senator to ask for a vote to-night.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Oh, no; I was asking that we might agree upon taking the vote some time to-morrow. I said I was willing for a vote to-night so far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator from Illinois mean a vote on the bill, or on the amendments?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. A vote on the bill and amendments at some time to-morrow, so that we may get rid of the whole subject. Cannot a time be set for doing that, an hour when the debate on the bill shall cease? I should be glad if it could be arranged to cease at four o'clock to-morrow, and then let us proceed to vote on the amendments. Then if the amendments are to be debated, let the debate be limited under the restrictions of the Anthony rule.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection as far as I am personally concerned that we shall commence voting, and debate on the bill cease at four o'clock to-morrow, and that after that each Senator shall be allowed ten minutes to speak on amendments.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I am satisfied with that.

Mr. GARLAND. I think that is a fair proposition. The Senator from Alabama has made a motion to recommit the bill with several important instructions. Let them come up to-morrow. I think the proposition that we stop general debate at four o'clock to-morrow and have a limited debate of ten minutes on each amendment after that will be right and fair.

Mr. PENDLETON. I think this matter is one of too much importance to undertake to limit the debate on all amendments to five minutes.

Several SENATORS. Ten minutes.

Mr. PENDLETON. Or ten minutes. I think the Senate has sufficient control of itself and its members to do what is right in that matter without entering into an agreement which seems to me entirely inconsistent with the dignity of the body.

Mr. GARLAND. As far as dignity is concerned, I want to say this: this bill has been very fully debated, and we have frequently entered into arrangements of this character in order to facilitate business after a measure has been considered for some time. To modify the proposition suppose we have it understood that we get rid of the bill at to-morrow's sitting and do not fix any limit as to time.

Mr. BECK. Why punish ourselves in that way?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let it be understood that general debate on the bill shall cease at four o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GARLAND. This is a very important matter, and by to-morrow there will have been ten days' debate on this bill. I think we can certainly dispose of the bill to-morrow. I do not desire to hasten any person, but I think we can certainly get rid of it to-morrow, and there are other important propositions behind which demand attention, as the bankrupt bill, the 5 per cent. fund bill, the Japanese fund bill, and all these measures ought to come up in their time.

Mr. ALLISON. Early next week we hope to have the Army appropriation bill before the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I have seen no factious opposition to this bill. It seems to me the discussion has been entirely legitimate and proper; it is a very important bill; and yet the intimation is that we have been throwing obstructions in the way.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I did not say so.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator did not say so, but it might very naturally be inferred from the remarks made by Senators. Months have been devoted to the discussion of the tariff-commission bill, of not half the consequence of this, and yet because what we conceive to be a proper discussion has been gone into these intimations are made.

Mr. GEORGE. I propose an amendment to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be received and printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to object to any understanding that the amendments be debated for ten minutes by each Senator after general debate on the bill closes?

Mr. PENDLETON. Yes, sir; I object to that.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be completed at to-morrow's sitting, without any reference to a limitation of debate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Can there be any objection to that?

Mr. ALLISON. My proposition is that the sitting to-morrow, before adjournment to-morrow, we shall finish this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. A unanimous understanding is not necessary for that. A majority can control it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. But we do not want to resort to the power of a majority. I want the Senate to agree to it.

Mr. ALLISON. Unanimous consent is better for such a purpose than a majority order.

Mr. BECK. I remarked in not a very loud tone, I thought, that there was no use in punishing ourselves, and the Senator from Arkansas rather objected to that remark. I think we can get through with this bill to-morrow; I am ready to vote now; and I believe the Senate will really get through sooner, for there is a general feeling that it ought to be disposed of promptly, without forcing us to make any agreement. That is my opinion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The understanding proposed now is that it is to be got rid of at to-morrow's sitting. There ought to be no objection to that. Is there objection to that?

Mr. BECK. I have none.

Mr. PENDLETON. If there were a unanimous agreement this evening that we should come to a vote before the adjournment to-morrow, it would be perfectly in order to adjourn to-morrow nevertheless.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I will say this to the Senator from Ohio, that if a gentleman sits here and makes such an agreement I have never known that he would get up and move an adjournment in violation of it. The Senator from Ohio would seem to indicate that if an agreement were made a majority could set it aside. Of course they could; but has that ever been done in the Senate? I have never known it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am, like the Senator from Kentucky, ready to vote now; but suppose we come here to-morrow under an agreement that we will dispose of this question, and the debate lasts to six or seven o'clock, gentlemen not having had their dinners will naturally want to go home, and an agreement now would imply an obligation upon everybody to remain here in order that a quorum might be maintained.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I do not want to give notice that I shall ask the friends of the bill to sit it out; but unless there is some agreement made that will have to be done.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the Senator give notice that he will try to get a vote to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Very well; I do give that notice.

Mr. ALLISON. One word. Unless we finish this bill to-morrow it is perfectly evident that we shall not finish it this week. We have been in the habit of adjourning over from Friday to Monday, and we shall undoubtedly take occasion to do so next Friday. If we do, it is manifest that we shall not secure a vote on as important a bill as this on Friday. So it is a question as to whether this bill shall be finished to-morrow or whether it shall take up another week.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I give notice that I shall endeavor to get a vote upon this bill to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois gives notice that he will endeavor to get a vote on this bill to-morrow.

DEFICIENCY FOR FUEL, LIGHTS, ETC.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I ask unanimous consent to lay the bill aside informally that I may make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 204) making an appropriation for fuel, lights, water, &c., for the fiscal year 1882, and for other purposes, to report it without amendment, and ask for its present consideration, as it will take but a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa reports a joint resolution and asks for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4429) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

WILLIAM J. LEE.

Mr. PLATT. An adverse report was made yesterday by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] on the bill (H. R. No. 2089) granting a pension to William J. Lee. At the request of a Senator, who desires to have further evidence submitted, I ask that the vote be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the vote by which the bill was postponed indefinitely be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

WILLIAM LOCKHART.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the 4th of April the bill (S. No. 886) granting a pension to William Lockhart was reported adversely from the Committee on Pensions by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] and indefinitely postponed. It escaped my observation at the time it was reported. I have had no opportunity of examining the report, and I ask that that action be reconsidered and the bill placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and nine minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 10, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGGS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. EVINS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for a moment, that I may ask to have a bill on the Speaker's table referred to a committee.

Mr. BRIGGS. I must object to that.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for, which is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4429) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture. The previous question has been ordered upon the bill and the substitute of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HUBBELL.]

Mr. HUBBELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUBBELL. Under the previous question, may I be allowed time to debate the substitute?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Michigan would not be entitled to debate the substitute under the previous question.

Mr. HUBBELL. Then I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] be allowed five minutes. He was a member of the sub-committee.

Mr. ANDERSON. This whole subject was debated——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. ANDERSON. There is; if it is open to debate on one side it must be open to debate on the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the substitute of the gentleman from Michigan, which will be read.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the Department of Agriculture, now established at the seat of Government of the United States, shall hereafter be an executive department, and the Commissioner thereof shall hereafter be known as the secretary of agriculture; and section 158 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to include said Department by adding at the end thereof the words: "Eighth. The Department of Agriculture," which shall hereafter be the title of said Department.

SEC. 2. That there shall be in the department of agriculture a secretary and an assistant secretary of agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and such secretary shall receive the same compensation as is now paid to the heads of the other Departments of the Government, and such assistant secretary shall receive a compensation of $4,000 per annum, each to be paid monthly; and a chief clerk of said department, to be appointed by the head thereof, at a salary of $2,500 per annum, to be paid monthly. And in addition to the powers and duties now devolved by law on said department there shall be added the powers and duties hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 3. That in addition to the duties now performed by the statistician of the Department of Agriculture, provided in section 520, title 22, of the Revised Statutes, it is hereby made the further duty of said statistician to collect all facts, information, and statistics obtainable relative to the annual product of manufactures and the cost thereof, the various processes employed, the quantity and value of raw materials consumed, and such other information as shall show each year the condition of manufactures in the several States. It shall also be the further duty of the said statistician to collect all facts relating to the wages of labor, hours of labor, and the general condition of the laboring classes throughout the country.

SEC. 4. ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RYAN. I rise to call up a privileged report, the report of the committee of conference on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand there is a bill which was made a special order in connection with the bill just disposed of, and which is now entitled to come up. I ask there may be an understanding that by proceeding to other business the special order does not lose its place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not; it is a continuing order.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to claim the floor at this time upon the special order—House bill No. 896, for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, &c. I desire to press this bill against all other business, except revenue and general appropriation bills. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Kansas upon a privileged report—a report of a conference committee.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understood the Chair to announce that the remaining bill embraced in the special order and yet undisposed of loses none of its rights, and can be called up in the future.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] can call up the special order to which he refers at any time after the morning hour.

Before the reading of the report was concluded,

Mr. HOLMAN said: The reading of this report conveys no information; and I suggest that the amendments be read in connection with the sections of the bill to which they relate, and that by unanimous consent the reading of the report be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the reading of the report be dispensed with——

Mr. HOLMAN. And that the amendments be reported as incorporated in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is unusual, the Chair thinks.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reading of the report conveys no information whatever to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the gentleman that by taking the printed bill and following the amendments as stated in the report there will be no difficulty.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the reading of the report be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any objection to dispensing with the reading of the report? The Chair hears none.

Mr. RYAN. The statement accompanying the report will, I think, explain sufficiently all the amendments, together with the action of the committee of conference respecting them.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I ask that the accompanying statement, without the report itself, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Statement in explanation of the report of the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 4185, Indian appropriation bill for 1883:

There were fifty-six amendments before the conference. They recommend that the Senate recede from eleven, the House recede from twenty-two wholly, and from twenty-three with amendments.

The money amount of these amendments is $543,800, of which the Senate yielded $255,200, and the House yielded $288,600, leaving the amount appropriated by the recommendation of the report $5,217,803.91; the amount recommended by the bill as it passed the House, $4,920,203.91. The effect in detail upon the amendments, if the report is adopted, will be as follows:

On amendment numbered 2: It increases the salary of the agent at the Uintah agency, from $1,000 to $1,500.

On amendment numbered 3: It releases the agent at the Navajo agency from the duties of teacher, and provides that no other money appropriated by this act shall be expended for clerical labor at this agency.

On amendment numbered 14: Corrects total of amount appropriated for agents' salaries.

On amendments numbered 15, 16, and 17: Reduces the amount for pay of interpreters from $25,000 to $20,000, and strikes out the limitation upon the annual pay of an interpreter employed east of the Rocky Mountains, and leaves section 2072 of the Revised Statutes repealed, as in the original text.

On amendment numbered 18: As fully set forth in the report.

On amendment numbered 19: To refuse traveling expenses of one inspector of Indian schools, $2,000.

On amendment numbered 20: To increase amount for buildings at agencies from $20,000 to $25,000.

On amendment numbered 21: To reduce special agents from five to four.

On amendment numbered 22: To reduce amount for contingencies for Indian service from $42,000 to $38,500.

On amendment numbered 27: To read as follows: "And hereafter the commission (of citizens serving without pay) shall only have power to visit and inspect agencies and other branches of the Indian service, and to inspect goods purchased for said service, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall consult with the commission in the purchase of supplies. The commission shall report their doings to the Secretary of the Interior."

On amendment numbered 32 as follows:

"That the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated out of the $300,000 reserved by the third article of the treaty with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, concluded April 8, 1866, for the purpose of educating freedmen in said tribes, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, three-fourths thereof for the freedmen among the Choctaws and one-fourth for the freedmen among the Chickasaws: Provided, That said sum of $10,000 shall be deducted in like proportion from any moneys in this act appropriated to be paid said Choctaws and Chickasaws: And provided further, That either of said tribes may, before such expenditure, adopt and provide for the freedmen in said tribe in accordance with said third article, and in such case the money herein provided for such education in said tribe shall be paid over to said tribe, to be taken from the unpaid balance of the $300,000 due said tribe."

On amendments numbered 33 and 34: To make the clause read as follows: "For settlement, &c., of Kickapoo Indians in the Indian Territory, lately removed from Mexico, including the purchase of stock, $8,000," and makes the total amount correspond.

On amendment numbered 35, strike out the words "except the per capita shares due the family of Sepequah, or Jane Drake, nine in number, the same to be retained in the Treasury for their benefit," and leaves the amendment thus:

"For payment to the delegation of the Miami Indians of Kansas, now or recently in Washington, the sum of $1,000, to reimburse them for money expended in 1881, to be paid out of any funds belonging to said tribe, and to be immediately available; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to pay per capita to the Miami Indians of Kansas, now residing in the Indian Territory, the amount found due said Indians at this date on account of proceeds of sales of their unallotted lands in Kansas, as provided by the act of March 3, 1873, the same to be immediately available."

On amendment numbered 40: Increases amount for aiding and instructing, &c., Poncas from $5,000 to $7,500.

On amendments numbered 41, 42, and 43: Leaves the sum for subsistence of Poncas at $25,000, as in original bill, corrects total to correspond, and provides that the sum appropriated ($40,500) shall be divided pro rata among all the members of said tribe in the Indian Territory and in Dakota Territory.

On amendment numbered 44: With reference to the Pottawatomies provides as follows:

"And the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to pay to or expend for the support, civilization, and instruction of the Prairie band of Pottawatomie Indians the amount of interest that has accrued, or may hereafter accrue, on the fund in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said band set apart for their benefit under authority of an act of Congress approved March 3, 1875: Provided, That not more than $8,000 shall be expended under this provision in any one year."

On amendments numbered 45 and 46: Changes the phraseology of the clause for subsistence of Sioux and reduces the amount from $1,100,000 to $1,075,000.

On amendments numbered 47 and 48: Reduces amount for civilization and instruction of Sioux and annuity goods $50,000 and excludes "pay of employés," the amount of reduction being taken from the item for "annuity goods," being amendment numbered 48.

On amendment numbered 49: Corrects the total amount for Sioux.

On amendments numbered 51 and 52: Reduces the amount for Apaches and other Indians in New Mexico from amount in original bill, $310,000, to $275,000, and changes the text to read as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. KETCHAM. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. HASKELL in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5664) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

Mr. KETCHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will withhold that motion until he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, in calling up the annual appropriation bill to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, I beg the indulgence of the committee for a few remarks.

The total amount appropriated by the bill is $3,411,798.08, which is $39,750.73 less than the estimates, and $33,780.64 in excess of the appropriations for the current fiscal year; the increase being found chiefly in the items for the construction of new sewers.

Of the sum to be appropriated, one-half is paid by the United States in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 11, 1878, providing a permanent form of government for the District, and the other half is furnished by the revenues of the District from taxation and other sources. These figures do not include the water department, as this branch of the District government is held not to be embraced in the law requiring the General Government to pay one-half of the District expenses. The revenues of that department, amounting to $111,050.50, are sufficient for its support and for interest and sinking fund on the water debt.

The estimated receipts of the District from taxes, licenses, and miner sources for the coming year are $1,725,816.43. Of the whole amount necessary to carry on the District government, over one-third, or $1,213,947.97, is required for interest and sinking fund on the funded debt of the District—a debt created chiefly by the Territorial government established by Congress in 1871 and abolished in 1874. The total debt apart from the water bonds, which amount to $379,000, is now $21,883,450, an enormous sum to rest upon a district embracing only about seventy-two square miles of area or 46,000 acres, and having a population of less than 200,000. The amount per capita of debt to population is about $110, and the annual interest and sinking-fund charge is over $6 for each man, woman, and child in the District.

By the provisions of the act of 1878 one-half of this heavy burden is assumed by the General Government; but even this relief, thought by some to be generous, but in reality only just, leaves a heavy weight for a community to bear which possesses neither manufactures nor commerce and has but a small store of accumulated wealth. The amount of debt per capita to population in New York City is in round numbers ninety dollars; in Boston, forty dollars; in Chicago, twenty dollars, and in Philadelphia, sixteen dollars. A considerable reduction in the interest burden of the District's liabilities has been effected by the 3.65 loan, which embraces about two-thirds of all the outstanding indebtedness.

The amount appropriated in the bill for interest and sinking fund is the sum estimated by the commissioner of the sinking fund as necessary to be regularly provided every year under the policy adopted by Congress four years ago to meet current interest obligations and extinguish the whole debt by the time the 3.65 bonds mature in 1924.

I have said that the assumption by the Federal Government of one-half of the expenses of the District is a measure of fairness only, not of generosity. The United States own fully one-half of the property in the District. The total value of real estate, when the last assessment, in 1880, was made, was $179,010,543, of which $88,953,078 was taxable property; $83,416,111 United States property, exclusive of streets and avenues in the city of Washington, which comprise about 43 per cent. of its total area of 6,110 acres, the sole title to which is vested in the United States, and $6,641,354 property non-taxable, other than that belonging to the Government. During the past year the value of new improvements added $1,525,320 to the amount of taxable real estate. The last assessment on personal property aggregates $9,666,272. Of course there is no valuation of the personal property in the possession of the General Government, but if the whole account could be stated as between the property of the United States in the District and that of private citizens it would, I am confident, appear that the Government owns the larger amount.

Congress was very slow to recognize its obligations toward the district set apart as the seat of the National authority, and placed under the exclusive control of the national Legislature. Until the adoption of the present form of local government but little was contributed from the United States Treasury toward District expenses, except for the improvement of streets around public reservations and the support of charitable institutions; and what was given was doled out without system or regularity.

The city of Washington was laid out upon a scale of grandeur befitting the capital of a great nation; but for nearly three-quarters of a century the realization of the plan was left almost exclusively to a scanty population whose means were wholly inadequate to the task of improving and beautifying the broad streets and stately avenues.

Up to the time when the territorial government of 1871 came into existence the capital was but wretchedly equipped with the ordinary city conveniences of paved streets, sewers, sidewalks, gas, and water. That government went to work to supply the obvious needs of the city, but without due regard to the capacity of the people to sustain the burden of a heavy debt. I need not here discuss the merits and demerits of the system they set on foot. It is sufficient to say that while the general plan was in the main wise and far-sighted, the magnitude of the work undertaken at the outset was so great that without the co-operation of the General Government financial difficulties were inevitable.

One of the heaviest items of District expenses in late years has been for replacing the decayed wooden pavements, represented by millions of debt, with a durable substitute. Washington may now boast of being the best-paved city on the continent, but it has attained this position at a great cost. Many of the first pavements were hardly completed before they became an impediment instead of an aid to travel. Twenty-four miles of almost impassable wooden pavements have been renewed with asphalt or stone since 1878, leaving about ten miles for future work to complete the renovation of the wood-paved streets.

In 1874 Congress abolished the complicated and costly territorial scheme of government, and put in its place the simple system of a commission composed of three members, vested with full authority to manage the affairs of the District.

This system, with some modifications, was made permanent by the act of 1878, which, at the same time, assumed on behalf of the General Government one-half of the total annual outlay of the District, including interest and sinking-fund charges. Four years' experience under what is known as the permanent government act has shown the system it provides to be comparatively economical and efficient, and to amply meet the needs of Washington as the national capital.

The only objection urged to this system is against its principle rather than its operation. It has no connection with popular suffrage, and thus appears to violate the most essential feature of our political institutions. The citizens of the District of Columbia vote for no public officers. The laws they obey are made by Congress, and their execution is placed in the hands of commissioners named by the President. All minor offices are filled by the commissioners, so that the local government at no point touches or depends upon the will of the governed. This objection may seem theoretically to be a grave one; but it has but little practical weight. The people of the District are apparently satisfied with their present form of government. The tax-paying classes, at least, seem almost unanimous in its favor, and have no desire to revive the costly experiment of suffrage and local legislation which the commission government displaced.

It should be borne in mind by those who are disposed to think the citizens of the District unjustly treated because they have no voice through the ballot-box in the management of either the General Government or their local affairs, that the Constitution does not contemplate giving them the privilege of suffrage. On the contrary, it vests the control of the District exclusively in Congress. The language of the Constitution on this point is explicit. It declares that Congress shall have power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States."

Whatever measure of suffrage has at any previous time been exercised by the people of the District has been not by virtue of any inherent right derived from the system of government, as in the case of the people of the States, but by the force of special enactments of Congress, in which it transferred to them a portion of its constitutional power. They have therefore no reason to complain because Congress has resumed its right of control and delegated the administration of the municipal affairs of the District to a commission, and they can at all times rely upon the prompt interference of the supreme law-making power for their protection in the event of an oppressive or unwise exercise of the authority of the commissioners.

Doubtless the framers of the Constitution thought that the inhabitants of the Federal District would be compensated for the loss of the elective franchise by the advantages of living at the seat of the General Government and by the liberality of that Government in adorning their city and providing it with parks, museums, and institutions of learning. It must be confessed, however, that if this was their view they had to wait a long time for its realization. Only in recent years has a spirit of intelligent interest characterized the dealings of the Government with the capital city.

The element of stability which the present municipal organization has given to the affairs of the District of Columbia is proving of great advantage in encouraging investments in real estate and stimulating valuable improvements. The law provides that in no case shall the annual tax assessment exceed $1.50 on the $100 valuation of city property, and $1 per $100 valuation on agricultural lands. Thus the property-holder knows exactly what he has to expect from the tax-gatherer, and is in no fear that his estate will be confiscated or reduced in value by heavy assessments for speical or general improvements. This security is increased by a provision of law forbidding any addition to the present indebtedness of the District. Any violation of this section of the permanent government act is punishable by imprisonment for a term of not exceeding ten years, and by a fine of not exceeding $10,000. It will be seen that the guaranty against oppressive taxation is ample.

A word about the machinery of the District government may not be out of place here. The police, schools, health, charities, fire, taxation, public works, and other branches are under the direct control of the commissioners. The revenues of the District from all sources are required to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and the management of the District debt is in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasurer of the United States, who is ex officio commissioner of the sinking fund.

One of the three commissioners is an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army, who is detailed for that duty, and who is assisted in the important engineering work of the District by two other engineer officers. While these officers have the immediate supervision of the improvements of streets, avenues, and sewers, all contracts therefor are required to be properly advertised and awarded to the lowest responsible bidders, and made and entered into only by and with the official unanimous consent of the commissioners.

The late engineer commissioner, whose recent untimely death all who have had personal or official relations with him deeply regret, was the first officer detailed to that position under the law establishing the permanent form of government for the District. Major W. J. Twining was an intelligent, efficient, and conscientious officer. It will be fortunate indeed for the District and country if his successor shall bring the same qualifications to the discharge of his varied and responsible duties and prove himself as deserving of public confidence.

The trustees of public schools serve without compensation.

Estimates for the expenses of the District government are first prepared by the commissioners and then revised by the Secretary of the Treasury before being transmitted to Congress.

A clause in the bill under consideration provides that only one of the commissioners need be a resident of the District when appointed. As Congress provides for one-half of the expenses, it is thought proper by the committee that the country at large should, in the discretion of the President, be given representation upon the commission. It is for the interest of the District as well as of the country that the board should have a national as well as a local character.

The committee will bear in mind in considering this bill that it differs in one important particular from all other regular appropriation bills. The Committee on Appropriations is limited in the total amount to be disposed of by the provisions of the permanent government act. Having ascertained the probable revenue of the District for the coming fiscal year, an equal amount is added for the Government's share of the expenses, and this gross sum is a fixed limit which we cannot exceed. We do not have the Treasury to draw on at our discretion, but must apportion this specific amount so as best to meet the wants of the different branches of the District government.

Coming now to the details of the bill, the committee will observe that, apart from the provision for the District debt, much the largest channel of expenditure is for the support of public schools. The total appropriation under this head is $526,075, of which sum $335,825 goes for the salaries of teachers, and $25,000 for care of school buildings, $99,000 for new buildings, and the remainder for fuel, rent, repairs, &c. It has been thought best by the committee to disregard the classification and salaries of teachers in the estimates, and to simplify the appropriation under this head by making it in one gross sum, specifying only the total number of teachers to be employed and the average salary.

This does not increase the salaries and grades of teachers, but leaves their arrangement as established by the present schedule. The schools of the District, I may add, are objects of just pride to the citizens, and are regarded by the leading educators of the country as occupying a high rank, in comparison with those of other cities. It is the aim of the District authorities, and I believe the desire of Congress, that they should reach the highest practicable standards of efficiency and excellence and serve as models of the free educational system, which is the only safe basis for republican institutions.

The growth of the public schools in the District of Columbia scarcely has a parallel in the country. In 1861 the whole number of pupils enrolled for that year in the public schools did not exceed 5,000; the number of teachers employed was about 60, and the annual expense of the schools was less than $35,000. There were at that time no public schools for the colored children of the District, and none for the white children residing in the county. In 1864 public schools were established for the colored children of the District and for the white children of the county.

The following table gives the school attendance and number of teachers employed from 1872 to 1881 inclusive:

Years.	Whole number of pupils enrolled.	Average number pupils enrolled.	Increase.	Per cent. of increase.	Number of teachers.	Increase.	Per cent. of increase.
1872	15,555	.....	.....	.....	263	.....	.....
1873	16,770	.....	.....	.....	271	8	3.0

1877	21,264	17,112	1,466	9.3	330	23	7.4
1878	22,842	18,959	1,847	10.7	370	40	12.1
1879	25,130	20,389	1,430	7.5	402	32	8.6
1880	26,439	21,600	1,211	5.9	434	32	7.9

Total	.....	.....	7,644	5,8	.....	198	5.8
Average per annum	.....	.....	1,276	.....	.....	22	.....

The following table gives the school children, school attendance, and school accommodations at the present time:

Children, teachers, accommodations.	White.	Colored.	Total.
Whole number of children of school age	31,652	14,906	46,558
Whole number on the school-rolls	18,569	10,040	28,609
Average number on the school-rolls	15,432	7,967	23,399
Entire number of school-rooms	260	134	394
Entire number of seats for pupils	14,378	7,575	21,953
Number of teachers employed	318	167	485

From the above it will be seen that the educational system of the District since 1861 has grown from a few straggling schools, attended by only the poorer classes of white children in the city, into a great system of public schools with an attendance of nearly 30,000 children of all classes, and a corps of nearly 500 teachers.

The system now includes well-organized high schools for both sexes and excellent training schools for graduates from the high schools who are to become teachers. In 1861 most of the schools occupied rented rooms, and the entire value of school property owned—sites, buildings, and furniture—did not exceed $20,000. Now the value of the school property owned is estimated at about $1,500,000.

The expense of building up and supporting such a system of schools has been a very heavy burden upon the District.

That public education is not more expensive in Washington than it is in other large cities of the country is shown by the following table, compiled from the last published report of the United States Commissioner of Education, showing the—

Comparative cost of education in fifteen large cities, based on the average daily attendance of pupils.

The population of the District is exceptional in regard to its tax-paying ability. About three-ninths of the inhabitants are colored, largely immigration from the States during the late war, and contributing comparatively little to the public revenue. About two-ninths are temporary residents, being composed of those who are from the States and employés of or connected with the General Government. The General Government until quite recently furnished the District no aid in building up this school system. It has appropriated millions of dollars, or the equivalent in public lands, to aid the common, higher, and technical schools in all the States and Territories except the District of Columbia. Why not be as liberal to the capital city, and thus let its public schools be made models for the country and the world?

The general expenses of the District government, including official salaries, fuel, repairs, insurance, and miscellaneous items, aggregate $138,657.11.

The police force requires for its maintenance $300,216, but it is too small to meet the growing demands of the District. Its size was fixed years ago, when the population was much smaller, and when extensive districts now covered with dwellings were open lots and fields. In some sections of the District private watchmen are employed by the residents, because the beats of the policemen are so large that it is impossible for them to afford the needful protection against thieves and burglars.

To secure efficient members of the force hereafter, however, certain restrictive features of the law governing appointments should be essentially changed. If the provision requiring appointments to be made from among those who have served in the Army or Navy be retained, then the law requiring appointees to be residents of the metropolitan police district for two years should be repealed, so that all Union soldiers and sailors may be eligible to appointment, without regard to residence.

The fire department costs $99,140. Its discipline and effectiveness are shown by the small aggregate loss during the year from fires.

The appropriation for street improvements is $300,000, the same as for the past four years. This sum is inadequate to replace the old wooden pavements and meet the urgent demands for the improvement of the remaining unpaved streets; but it is all the committee felt justified in allowing, in view of the other pressing needs of the District.

The progress of the important Boundary street intercepting sewer calls for $85,000; an increase of $35,000 over last year; $350,000 have already been expended upon it, but as yet it is of little benefit. With the expenditure of $85,000 more the sewer will reach Gales's Creek and be of permanent advantage to the city.

The northwestern intercepting sewer, a new work of considerable importance, the estimated cost of which is $75,000, requires $50,000. The items for current expenses of streets and county roads are $50,000; for the parking commission, $19,900, and for lighting the streets and necessary repairs in connection therewith, $106,250. The health department is given $40,340. The public charities, $184,554, including the support of the insane, the asylum, the reform school, the relief of the poor, and contributions for hospitals and asylums supported in part by private benevolence. The item for the indigent insane, which was $37,000 two years ago and $40,000 last year, is increased to $43,200, the proportionate expense of the support of the Government Hospital for the Insane assigned to the District as per report of its superintendent.

In view of the growing demands for appropriations for charitable purposes, the creation of a board of charities having the supervision of all the expenditures on account of benevolent institutions in the District would be a wise measure for Congress to adopt.

The revenues of the District under the present permanent system of the equal division of its expenses between the General Government and the taxpayers will suffice for the extinguishment of the debt, as I have shown, provide for all the general expenses, and carry forward from year to year at a moderate rate of progress the work of grading and paving, the construction of sewers, and the admirable system of tree planting in the streets, which have added so much to the beauty and comfort of the city.

There are, however, two important lines of expenditure which should be undertaken by the Government alone, and which ought not to be longer postponed. The most pressing of these is the enlargement of the water supply, which is now totally inadequate to meet the needs of the present population. Serious inconvenience is experienced by householders living in the higher districts by reason of the want of sufficient pressure in the pipes to carry the water to the upper stories. The consumption by the Government, as well as by the citizens, is increasing rapidly, and the need of early action to increase the supply is too apparent to require argument.

No provision is made to meet this need by the bill under consideration, the subject being more properly one for special legislative action. A reference to it here seems proper, however, in connection with my remarks on the general affairs of the District. I need hardly add that whatever measure Congress may adopt to deal with this question should contemplate such an increase of aqueduct and reservoir capacity as will meet all possible wants for a long time to come.

The other improvement which demands the attention of Congress is provided for by a separate bill now pending. I refer to the reclamation of the tidal flats lying along the water front of the city. When the capital was first established here there was deep water in the river from Georgetown down to the mouth of the Eastern Branch, and vessels passed up and down the stream where there is now a broad miasmatic marsh, barely covered at high tide. The filling of this marsh and the improvement of the channel, deemed practicable by competent engineering authority, will greatly promote the sanitary and commercial interests of the District. That it is the duty of the National Government to promptly undertake this improvement cannot be doubted. The land reclaimed will be the property of the Government, and according to careful estimates will more than repay the cost of the improvement.

In conclusion permit me to say a few words about the very gratifying growth of Washington in recent years. In 1870 the population of the District of Columbia was 131,700. The census of 1880 showed it to have increased to 177,624. The two years which have elapsed since the census was taken have undoubtedly added 10,000 more to the population. This substantial growth, comparing favorably with that of many of the prosperous manufacturing and commercial cities, is largely due to the wise and just policy of Congress in contributing its share toward beautifying the city and making it a peculiarly desirable place of residence.

It cannot be attributed to the development of the surrounding country, for that has made very little progress; nor to the increase of commerce or trade, for Washington, owing to its long-neglected water front, has but little commerce and its trade is limited to supplying the wants of its own inhabitants. Nor have manufactures or other important business enterprises been established to encourage immigration by employing large numbers of working people. We must therefore seek for the cause of the large additions to the population of the capital in its increasing attractiveness as a place of residence.

This view is sustained by the character of the recent improvements. The many substantial and spacious houses lately erected show a large influx of people of means and culture, who are drawn here by the intellectual and social advantages of Washington and its facilities for leading healthful and agreeable lives. Entire sections which were lately waste land have been reclaimed, and are now covered by residences which for commodiousness and architectural beauty are scarcely surpassed in any of the great cities of the world.

The owners of these dwellings and of the thousands of other comfortable houses built within the past decade have chosen Washington as a place of permanent abode because of its well-paved, well-drained, and well-shaded streets; its many attractive parks; its statues and monuments, recalling glorious events and heroic men; its treasures of art and science; its stately public buildings; its mild winter climate; its cultivated, hospitable society and the constant interest which attaches to it as the seat of the Government of a great nation. Congress has but to continue the just and intelligent policy it has lately inaugurated in regard to District affairs to make the capital the object of national pride its projectors intended it should be; and I have no doubt that the people will approve all proper legislation looking to this end.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move by unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will now be read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill without amendment until he reached the following paragraph:

For the relief of the poor, $15,000, of which $3,600 shall be expended for the use of the Central Dispensary and Emergency Hospital, in equal monthly installments. And the compensation of not to exceed five physicians to the poor shall be at the rate of not exceeding $50 per month.

Mr. KETCHAM. I move, Mr. Chairman, by instruction of the Committee on Appropriations, the following amendment:

Strike out "not to exceed five," and in lieu thereof insert the word "the;" so it will read:

"And the compensation of the physicians to the poor shall be at the rate of not exceeding $50 per month each."

The adoption of that amendment will make this paragraph conform to the law as it was passed last year.

Mr. HISCOCK. The committee recommended the paragraph as it stands in the bill, but after further consideration agreed to restore the appropriation to what it was in the preceding appropriation bill for this District. As amended, it will provide that the compensation of the physicians for the poor shall be at the rate of not exceeding $50 per month each.

Mr. HOLMAN. You strike out the word "five."

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes; the effect is to strike out the word "five."

Mr. KETCHAM. If the amendment be adopted it will not be an increase over the law as it now stands upon the statute-book.

Mr. HOLMAN. The present law fixes the number at five.

Mr. HISCOCK. The amendment makes it conform to the present law, and that is all. The bill as reported was an amendment of the present law. The committee recommend now that there shall be a return to the present law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the gentleman from New York examined into the matter before this provision was incorporated, and I infer he reached the conclusion that five was a sufficient number of physicians to be employed for this purpose. I hope if he has had occasion to change his mind he will explain it to the committee.

Mr. HISCOCK. The reason for changing the paragraph back to the original law is this: the committee, I believe, were unanimous in favor of the bill as it is reported, but we became satisfied a point of order would be made against that provision, and therefore we have recommended the amendment moved by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KETCHAM.]

Mr. HOLMAN. But the point of order is not made against it.

Mr. HISCOCK. We became convinced it would be, and therefore we have accepted the situation and ourselves moved to change it.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is mistaken; the point of order would not lie.

Mr. HISCOCK. It would have been made.

Mr. HOLMAN. If made it would not lie, as it is not a good point of order. Does the gentleman hold that we cannot on this bill reduce the number of employés, in that or any other paragraph of the bill? In my judgment this amendment is germane and would reduce expenditures at least one-half.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will state further, in reply to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Indiana, that the chairman of the sub-committee having charge of this bill, on consultation with the health officer of the District, came to the conclusion it was best to return to the provision of existing law.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman will permit me I will corroborate his statement by an additional suggestion. At the time this bill was reported by the sub-committee to the full committee, proposing to cut down the number of physicians for the poor, I have a distinct recollection of the fact, which I doubt not the gentleman will recall, of suggesting that it seemed to me to be too radical a reduction of the force. The law as it at present stands allows eleven physicians for the poor. This bill as reported cuts that number down to five. I then took occasion to have a talk with the health officer himself, and felt convinced the opinion expressed by me in the first instance was sustained, that it was too radical a reduction.

The health officer tells me it is impossible to sustain the force he has, and for which Congress makes proper and adequate appropriation, with such a reduction of more than 50 per cent. of that number of physicians furnished to the indigent of this District. I opposed it at the time, and I think now the number incorporated in the bill is too small. For that reason I am in favor of the amendment which is submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KETCHAM.]

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The fact remains, Mr. Chairman, that the Committee on the District of Columbia have agreed unanimously, as the gentleman from New York states, that it was entirely proper to reduce the number of these physicians more than one-half; and it is also manifest that the provision of this bill reducing the number is clearly in order, and judging simply from the experiences of communities of other sections of the country, certainly no more healthful than this District, I am compelled to conclude, and it seems to me there will be little question as to the fact in the mind of any gentleman present, that the number of physicians, eleven, named in the law is unnecessarily extravagant. But I desire more particularly in this connection to express my dissent from the whole character of the legislation touching the expenses of this District and its government.

In my judgment the principle which charges the whole people of this country with one-half of the current expenses of this District is radically unjust, and the extravagance of these provisions, if you will examine each one of them in detail throughout this bill, must strike every gentleman as an outgrowth of the prodigal liberality of the Government in assuming in the main the expenses of this District. This assumption of the large part of the expenses of this District occurred some four years ago. I was not then a member of the House, and I cannot agree to the provisions of the law.

I had thought when this bill first came in many amendments might be suggested to reduce these various items of appropriation. But on coming to examine the bill more carefully I find throughout an apparent effort to multiply employments and increase the compensation attaching to them. The salaries allowed go far beyond those known to populous cities, and the number of salaried offices is simply enormous.

This whole bill is radically wrong, so that to attempt reductions here and there would be simply a consumption of time without profit. It is manifest that it would be a very difficult matter to bring the House to a fair consideration of this bill, or to the adoption of any measures which would promote economy in the expenditures of this District. This bill is extravagant from beginning to end; and why not, when the whole people bear the expense? And yet there is not, throughout the entire country, another population equally wealthy with this, corresponding in numbers. The lavish expenditures of Government have crystallized here into easy and ample fortunes. This is very natural, for none of our other cities even approximates in extravagance the amount that is annually expended under our legislation by the General Government in this city, extent of population considered; and yet, living as they do in the midst of elegance and luxury, this society of elegant leisure almost escapes the burdens of Government, and Congress, under the blandishments of the capital, imposes one-half of the entire expenses of the government of this city on the people of the entire country. You tax the whole people that the society which treats you with distinguished consideration may escape taxes. I think this is one of the most extraordinary features of our extraordinary system of expenditure, in which the multitude is taxed for the benefit of the few.

Such a state of legislation would have been impossible even fifteen years ago. I am certain it would have been absolutely impossible twenty years ago. Favoritism then was not a rule of legislation, but now this bill, extravagant in every detail and feature, multiplying employments far beyond what is provided in great cities of the country, increasing employments and seeking to find new employments, and uniformly fixing large salaries, yet charging one-half of the large aggregate upon the whole people of this country, this bill alone charges $1,700,000 on the public Treasury for the benefit of this city. This charge upon the industry of the whole people for the benefit of the few is a feature of our governmental policy against which I shall always feel called upon to protest.

It does not seem worth while to make objections to specific items. The whole system is vicious and wrong in itself. Nor is it creditable to our system of government that the people here should be deprived of their right of self-government on the one hand, nor, on the other, that the whole people of this country should be taxed to relieve the citizens of this District from the reasonable burdens of government. I do not know which is the most vicious—the most un-American. You deprive a portion of the people of the right of self-government and tax the whole people to relieve them from the expense of government.

If the people of this city managed their own affairs as they did a few years ago by their own modest and unpretending city government, before your legislation inspired them with corrupting extravagance, there would be no such army of officers employed as this bill provides for, there would be no such examples of extravagance as we see on every page of this bill; but until the people of the District exercise the powers of local self-government in common with their fellow-citizens everywhere else, I will never cast my vote in favor of a bill appropriating money for this District. No bill was ever considered by Congress so wholly un-American as this. It contains but two features: the one legislates for a people wholly deprived of political rights, the other taxes the whole people of this country to relieve them from taxation. What a spectacle in this Republic!

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not understand that debate is limited except by the usual hour rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the committee is now proceeding under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HISCOCK. There was no objection to the motion or request I made for unanimous consent that we proceed to consider the bill by sections under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. But there has been no motion to limit debate; that of course could only be done in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The chair understands that; but after the gentleman from New York had concluded his speech no other gentleman took the floor; after which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations asked unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill by sections, which was granted, under which system we are now proceeding and which allows debate only under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. My understanding is that inasmuch as we had dispensed with the first formal reading of the bill and were proceeding to consider it by sections, it had no reference to nor would it interfere with general debate upon the bill. If the gentleman from New York proposed to limit debate, that of course could only be done in the House.

Mr. HISCOCK. It has already been held in considering other appropriation bills that where unanimous consent is given to proceed to the consideration of a bill by sections the proceeding is under the usual five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. That has been, in the judgment of the Chair, the practice.

Mr. HOLMAN. That has not been the usage I think. However, I will suggest to the gentleman from New York that he makes a mistake in this objection; for members will find it necessary hereafter to be more careful in giving consent to requests of this kind for the transaction of business in the House. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Industrial Home school, $5,000.

Mr. HORR. I send an amendment to the desk to this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out line 128 and in place thereof insert the following:

"For the Industrial Home School, $13,000, $5,000 of which shall be used for building a second cottage on the premises, under the direction of the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order on that amendment until I can hear an explanation of it.

Mr. HORR. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will give me their ear for a moment, as this amendment is in reference to an institution whose wants and necessities I am satisfied our committee did not fully understand or they would not have made the small appropriation for it that this bill contains. It is an institution organized for the purpose of reclaiming little orphan children from the age of five to twelve years. They pick them up through the streets of this city, take them to this home, and teach them ways of cleanliness, habits of industry, and prepare them for the best walks of life as American citizens. It was gotten up by a few philanthropic men and women in this city, who labor without pay and whose hearts are devoted to this work simply as a method of bettering their fellow-men.

Last year we appropriated for this object the sum of $10,000, $5,000 of which was for the purpose of building a cottage, which is now completed and occupied by the girls of the school. The institution now needs another cottage for the boys, which will cost $5,000 more. In addition to this the number of the pupils in this school has increased until they now have eighty-one. They cannot absolutely live and keep their family together on the $5,000 allowed in this bill. To do this they need at least $8,000. Hence I have added to the bill $5,000 for another cottage, and $3,000 more for their support, making in all $13,000. The members of this House will understand this is no experiment, this method of taking children who are homeless, friendless, and poverty-stricken, and so educating them that they will be taken into the families of respectable people, thereby furnishing for them homes, and saving them from the almshouses and prisons of the country. In my own State of Michigan we have such an institution, and the superintendent of that school has kindly furnished me with a few of the results of the work of that institution, which I know this House will be interested in, because they apply directly to the kind of a school in whose behalf I am now speaking. This school is located near Cold Water, in my State, and is called the State Public School. It is supported entirely by our State funds, and its inmates are taken from all the counties of the State.

The superintendent tells me in this communication, which I hold in my hand, that up to this date the entire appropriations for this institution, for their farm of seventy-four acres, buildings, steam, gas and water works, furniture, and bedding, amount to $179,000. That, you understand, is for its building, and farm of seventy-four acres, and ten cottages, furniture, &c., as I have just said. This school is run on the cottage system, each cottage containing about thirty children, thereby introducing into the school the element of the family. Most of these children have never had the benefits of a mother's love. They know nothing of the ennobling influences of an American home; and the idea is to surround them with these home-like influences and thereby lead them from a lower to a higher life. No better plan can be devised for preventing crime. Depravity is so often the result of one's early surroundings. Crime can often be traced to the environment of the boy or girl when yet very small. We are all of us so much the creatures of circumstances. This plan of bettering humanity recognizes these facts and attempts to cure the difficulty by commencing when the children are young and hence easily bettered by their new surroundings.

This superintendent tells us that since this Michigan school started they have been able to run it on from $111 to $118 a year for each pupil. They had last year an average of three hundred and five children, and our Legislature gave them $36,000. There have been received into this school since it started eight years ago 1,171 children. I hope the House will bear with me while I show the results of this most philanthropic work. Since the school opened, I say, 1,171 children have been received, of which number seven hundred and twenty-five are now in good homes, scattered all over our State. They have been taken to these homes by people who were childless, or others who wanted to do a little good in the world; and thus many of them are now learning what it is to be surrounded by loving hearts and willing hands. There are left in the institution three hundred and five. There have been sent away from this institution as incorrigible since it was founded only forty-five children. And he says that of the entire number thus taken from the lower grades of society who have been thus received into this school, less than 3 per cent. of them have found their way into those institutions where they punish people for crime. Only think of such a result, to take 1,171 such unfortunate children, 80 per cent. of whom seemed born for lives of shame and degradation, and by this humane treatment saving all but 3 per cent. of them. I submit, this result seems almost marvelous.

This expense of $118 a year to each child covers all their teaching, all their fuel, all their bedding, all their clothing, all their food, all needed repairs, all the salaries of the instructors, superintendent, in fact, all expenses of every kind. He writes me here about one boy who was sent from my own town, a little lad whom I knew very well, who had one leg taken off by the cars. He was considered a tough, bad boy, and was sent to this school. The superintendent writes me now that this same young lad is a telegraph operator in the city of Detroit, and that he is fast rising to distinction in that profession. They teach telegraphy in the institution. He says many others of the children have turned out equally well.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VALENTINE was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. HORR.

Mr. HORR. I only want a few moments more. I feel this is a subject this House ought to look squarely in the face. I claim that this method of improving the condition of the human family is one of the very best ever devised by the civilization of this century; this taking of children at a tender age, when they can be molded, when they can be influenced, when their character can be readily shaped for the better, and thus instructing them in the true methods of right living. This method saves to the State thousands of dollars which we must otherwise spend in punishing them as criminals. In this city, as I have already said, they have a school of eighty-one little children. I visited them at their home, have been among them, and know the work which is there being done; and I say there is not a gentleman on this floor who, if he will go and look this institution over, will not come back determined to lend those Christian men and women who are managing this benevolent enterprise a helping hand. Five thousand dollars does not put the school above starvation point. The $8,000 I propose to give will not be $100 for each pupil a year, while $111 is the lowest our Michigan school ever reached; hence they will be compelled to turn some of their children away, unless we give them a larger appropriation. With $8,000—$3,000 more than this appropriation—they say they can get through the year. The other $5,000 I have added is for the purpose of building another cottage.

I dislike very much to seem to attack in any way an appropriation bill which is so fair a bill as this is. I have read it section by section, and it is an admirable bill. But I do say that even my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who generally sits here and watches the Treasury with such vigilance, can hardly raise a point of order or make any opposition to this kind of an appropriation. To do that, it seems to me, would be to mistake parsimony for economy.

Mr. Chairman, I can but wish that I had on this occasion the eloquence of my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] who has so often presented the cause of the brave surfmen on the floor of this House. We all recollect how vividly he portrayed the heroic deeds of the men in this life-saving service, in their struggling efforts to save the shipwrecked mariners from the cruel waves and surging billows, and how touchingly he described the dangers and hardships of those brave men who "go down to the sea in ships;" and yet here we have large numbers of little waifs, who in early childhood are wrecked on the bleak and cruel shores of poverty and want. Many of them even in their cradles are tossed about on the billows of crime and depravity. Most of them, as I have already said, know little of a mother's love; few of them have ever been blessed with the kindly influences that surround the ordinary American home.

Why wonder that such children, corrupted by such surroundings, live lives of shame and fall into paths that end in crime? The object of this institution is to take these desolate, deserted little ones and make for them a home; to teach them ways of cleanliness, habits of industry, the value of goodness, and to inspire them with the desire to reach the glorious heights of true manhood and true womanhood. A few philanthropic men and women have organized themselves into a life-saving crew, and they would, if possible, rescue these unfortunate children of our capital city from a fate tenfold worse than a watery grave. That they may go on in this errand of love and mercy, that they may succeed in their efforts to accomplish this grand work, they hold out their hands and ask us to give them enough money to keep them above the starving point. These managers work without pay, without price. Can it be possible that there is a man in this House who will oppose this amendment?

I cannot, I will not believe it. What I ask is not an extravagant appropriation, but I do hope we shall not commence treating the benevolent institutions of this District in a step-mother fashion. My colleague, near me here, [Mr. RICH,] who has had great experience in our State Legislature, tells me that no bill in our State receives more hearty support than the one providing for our school at Cold Water. Our great capital should be able to have institutions of this kind which will be an honor and a credit to this great nation, institutions that should be models for the States, that should be looked up to as institutions worthy of imitation. I have said all I desire to upon this subject. I do hope that the House will treat this matter in that liberal spirit which the real interests of society and good government demand.

Mr. HISCOCK. I certainly do not intend to antagonize the sentiments uttered by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR.] I mean by that that I heartily sympathize with all that he said in favor of schools of this character. I listened, while this bill was in preparation, to arguments more eloquent than any the gentleman has been able to urge here to-day, because that eloquence was seconded by the pathetic appeals of ladies who to a certain extent have in charge matters of this kind in this District. And in preparing this bill the Committee on Appropriations concluded that it would be liberal in all of this class of appropriations; that we would give all that any man would say was a proper amount to be given to the District for this purpose; that we would give all that would be given in any State for this purpose.

We recognized the fact in making these appropriations that good and charitable people here in the District are accustomed to get together and organize a board, and advertise to the world a charitable and philanthropic institution to be supported by voluntary contributions. But by the time such an institution has been in existence a year they come to Congress and ask to be attached to an apropriation bill. I say we recognize that fact to some extent in making this list of appropriations.

We appropriate for these institutions in this city the sum of $205,000. I appeal to gentlemen, members of this House, if that is not a liberal appropriation? I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] what city in his State of the size of this city contributes $200,000 to support institutions of this character?

The course of this institution is almost marked out by the speech of the gentleman which he has just made. A house was built last year; another one is to be built this year, and another next year; until finally this institution will come to Congress and ask for an appropriation of $50,000 to support and sustain it. It was started originally to be supported by the voluntary contributions of individuals; but those contributions have been meager, and therefore they come to Congress and ask for aid.

I say that having given for this purpose in the aggregate $200,000, we have gone to the limit of the amount that should be appropriated.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. HORR; and upon a division there were—ayes 29, noes 46.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. MCKENZIE called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, there being but eight in the affirmative, not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For the erection of a building on the grounds recently purchased by the German Protestant Orphan Asylum Association of the District of Columbia, $5,000: Provided, That the asylum shall contribute an equal sum for this purpose.

Mr. KETCHAM. I move to amend the paragraph just read by inserting after the words "District of Columbia" the words "now the German Orphan Asylum Association of the District of Columbia." The object of that amendment is this: a bill has been passed by Congress and approved by the President changing the name of this association, since this appropriation bill was prepared.

Mr. KLOTZ. Why not simply strike out the word "Protestant."

Mr. HISCOCK. The object of the amendment in this form, instead of that suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KLOTZ,] is this: the ground was purchased in the name of the German Protestant Orphan Asylum Association; and the appropriation is given to the asylum under the name by which the title was granted in the deed. The name of the association, however, has been changed since then by law, and this amendment is rendered necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL EXPENSES

For salaries and contingent expenses:

For executive office: For two commissioners, at $5,000 each; and the provision in section 2 of an act approved June 11, 1878, entitled "An act providing for a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia," requiring that the two commissioners of the District of Columbia appointed from civil life shall have been actual residents of the District of Columbia for three years next before their appointment, and have during that period claimed residence nowhere else, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that only one of said two commissioners shall be required to be a resident of the District of Columbia; one engineer commissioner, $1,160.11, (to make salary $5,000;) one secretary, $2,160; one clerk, $1,500; one clerk, $1,400; one messenger clerk, $900; one messenger, $600; one driver, $480; for contingent expenses, including printing, books, stationery, and miscellaneous items, $3,000; in all, $21,240.11.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I make the point of order against so much of the paragraph which has just been read as is included between lines 143 to 153 inclusive, that portion of the paragraph which proposes to repeal the provision adopted in 1878, when Congress passed the organic law under which this District is to be governed. That provision of that law requires that the two civil commissioners of this District shall each have a bona fide residence of three years in the District prior to their nomination and appointment as such commissioners, and that during that three years they shall have claimed residence nowhere but in this District.

The portion of the paragraph to which I have called attention and to which I now object proposes to repeal the residence clause of the general law, so far as one of these civil commissioners is concerned. I raise the point of order that it changes existing law and does not, either upon its face or otherwise, tend to reduce expenditures.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I think the point of order is well taken by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.] It is difficult to see why the Committee on Appropriations should desire to impose upon the people of this District a commissioner who is not a resident of the District and not familiar with the wants and interests of its people. I do not believe that the members of this committee would be willing that the governors of their States should be imported from any other States in the Union, principally for the reason that they would not be familiar with the wants and institutions of the people of their State.

I hope the Chair will sustain the point of order, and that we shall get as near local self-government in this District as we possibly can. The people here have no right to vote, and have no right to choose their commissioners or governors, and it strikes me we should get as near as the law permits us to get a local self-government.

Mr. COBB. I would have been glad if no point of order had been made upon this paragraph. In my judgment two of these commissioners ought to be selected from the country at large. The Government of the United States pays one-half of the entire running expenses of this District. The object of this provision, I have no doubt, though I have not consulted with those who drafted the bill, was to get good men to act as commissioners; men who would not be under the influence of certain parties, who, as a rule in this District, control the men who have heretofore been appointed. There is more in that than there is in the theoretical question of self-government. By the express terms of the Constitution, this District is under the control of Congress, and the Constitution must be changed before we can give the District the right of self-government enjoyed by the States under the Constitution, and by the Territories under the laws of Congress.

So far as concerns the present board of commissioners, I wish to say frankly and with all due respect to the members of the board that in my judgment, from careful investigation which I gave to this subject for two years while I had charge of the District appropriation bill, the people of this District are not represented upon that board, and never have been. It is a few men in the District who are represented; the great body of the people of the District are not represented. The men who have had control of the District have listened to the few as against the many. [Mr. BLACKBURN rose.] I know this to be so, for I inquired into the matter as carefully as any man ever did, and I think the gentleman from Kentucky will bear me out in the statement——

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; I will answer the gentleman in a moment. I rise now to ask him (if he will permit me) whether he thinks the government of the District of Columbia was any more honest or any more economical or any better or any more satisfactory to the property-holders of the District when it was under the rule of non-resident commissioners than it is to-day?

Mr. COBB. I do not know. I very frankly say I never looked into the question of extravagance or economy with regard to the District government prior to the establishment of the system under which the District affairs are now managed. But I do say that so far as regards extravagance, so far as regards deference to their demands and wants, the people cannot be worsted by a change. I know that there is no effort at economy, and there has not been any, so far as my knowledge has extended since I have had anything to do with the District appropriation bills. On the contrary, demands are being made upon Congress for thousands of dollars that ought not to be, and have not been appropriated. It is a question with the present board of commissioners how much money they can get out of the Treasury—not how little they can get along with. I say this frankly, for I know what I say. I know that the chairman of the sub-committee who has this bill in charge will bear me out in the statement that he has been obliged to disregard entirely the views and counsel of the board of commissioners, and to follow his own judgment upon matters of expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind gentlemen that a point of order is pending.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I did not care to object to the course which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] has taken in discussing this point of order. I hardly think that he believes he confined himself to the point of order. I insist on that point; but under the peculiar circumstances I trust the committee will allow me to say one word in reply to the gentleman.

The board of commissioners of the District of Columbia consists of three men. The gentleman from Indiana has had opportunity—an exceptional opportunity—to advise himself as to their efficiency and capabilities. He has reflected upon that board of commissioners to such an extent that although I may not be speaking to the point of order, I ask to be heard a single moment in reply. It becomes peculiarly fitting that some response should be made, because during the present week, which is not yet half gone, one of the largest concourses of citizens ever gathered in the country's capital upon such an occasion has followed to their last resting place the remains of a commissioner who reflected credit upon himself in the discharge of his duties as a civil officer as he had shed luster upon the military record of the country as an officer of its Army. This District will be more than another century old ere it is given a ruler that will bring to the high office a purer character, a more thorough devotion to duty, larger capacity or more manly attributes. Whether as citizen, soldier, or governor, he commanded the respect and more, the affections of all. The people of this District honored him living and now mourn him dead.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman will allow me a moment. I intended to make an exception. I spoke of the board as it now exists, and I think my language would import that I did make an exception in regard to the commissioner recently deceased. I desire to bear my evidence, so far as it may go, to the integrity of that deceased commissioner. I intended to refer to the board as it now exists—the two members now constituting the board. In regard to Major Twining, it is my duty to bear testimony to his integrity, honesty, and moral worth. As an officer he was above suspicion; as an adviser in his department, the engineer department, I never failed to get from him any desired information. The gentleman from Kentucky will pardon me for occupying his time in making this statement, because it is due to myself and to the deceased commissioner.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wanted to afford the gentleman opportunity to make such a statement, which I knew he was ready to make. I will say nothing more on behalf of that dead commissioner, for his memory needs no vindication. In regard to the two surviving commissioners I wish to say that I also have had some exceptional opportunities of advising myself as to the municipal government of this District. In a former Congress I was chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I have been identified through membership of the Appropriations Committee with District legislation from that time until now. I undertake to say that in this city or in this land you cannot find any commissioner, either resident or non-resident, who for personal integrity, for honesty of purpose and fidelity in the discharge of duty will rank superior to those two surviving commissioners. They may not have been trained to the discharge of executive duties; it may be that men more experienced in such matters might be found. But I repudiate the suggestion that in a city of 160,000 people, the very culture of this continent, as its capital is admitted to be, you cannot find two resident gentlemen who are fitted to fill the rôle of municipal authority or mayor of a town.

So much for the merits of the question. But I did not go into a discussion of the merits. I raised the point of order, which I am willing to submit to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have not called the attention of either gentleman to the fact that his remarks have been a good deal out of order. It is conceded on the part of the committee that if the point of order is taken it is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the words objected to are ruled out and form no part of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For streets:

For sweeping, cleaning, and sprinkling streets and avenues, $33,000; cleaning alleys, $7,500; for current work of repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys, $25,000; current repairs to county roads, $25,000; cleaning and repairing lateral sewers and basins, $20,000; in all, $110,500. And the commissioners are authorized to extend and improve the intersection between Vermont avenue and Thirteenth street, northwest, south about one hundred feet to the line of the lots owned by private parties.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order to the last sentence in that paragraph. I make the point that these words are not in order, and must be stricken from the bill:

And the commissioners are authorized to extend and improve the intersection between Vermont avenue and Thirteenth street, northwest, south about one hundred feet to the line of the lots owned by private parties.

My point of order is that it is new legislation, and does not retrench expenditures.

The effect of that clause is to close up and vacate so much of O street, northwest, as extends from Thirteenth street to Vermont avenue. While the clause does not say in so many words that it is to close up a street, yet that is the effect of it. The extension of that little park, which is at the intersection of Thirteenth street and Vermont avenue, south to the lots owned by individuals would close up that part of O street stretching from Thirteenth street to Vermont avenue. It is new legislation, and the expense attending that closing up and extending the little park across and embracing that portion of O street of course is an expense not now provided by law, and would increase expenditures instead of diminishing them.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, a single word in reply to the gentleman who raises the point of order. This legislation is in the general direction of extending and opening streets, and the only power to open and extend streets, as I understand it, is vested in Congress. It is a part of the organic law in effect that Congress should exercise this right. There are other items in the bill in the same direction, and any fair construction of the rules cannot treat this as anything else than the continuance of the legitimate work of repairs and as perfecting the system of streets of the District of Columbia.

That is the answer to the point of order, and any other rule of construction than that would prevent the opening of any streets in this city, or the extension of any streets would be narrowed and confined to the present limits, whatever the growth of the city may be.

All Congresses since the organic act was passed have treated this as a part of the work in progress. It is a part of the scheme of providing for the government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I agree with my distinguished friend from New York, that all legislation touching the District of Columbia is vested by law in the Congress of the United States, but I hold that under the rules of this House Congress cannot adopt new legislation on an appropriation bill when the point of order is raised that new legislation does not retrench expenditures.

The gentleman says that this is a part of the process of improvement of the city in extending public highways or streets within its limits, and therefore that it is in order on an appropriation bill. The gentleman well knows if it is desirable to open new streets that is a proper subject-matter of legislation over which Congress has unquestionable jurisdiction.

But the point I make is this clause proposes new legislation in this that it closes up a part of O street, an established street in the city, reaching from Thirteenth street to Vermont avenue; because it is legislation upon an appropriation bill and is obnoxious to the restriction of the rule that it does not retrench expenditure. If it is within the rule that a small portion of O street may be closed up by tacking it on to an appropriation bill, then the Appropriations Committee may tack on their appropriation bill for the District of Columbia the vacation of the whole of O street from one end to the other of that street, or the vacation and closing up of the whole of Pennsylvania avenue from one end of the city to the other. That would be legitimate in a bill reported for that purpose, but it would not be in order upon a general appropriation bill.

The point I make, Mr. Chairman, is this: that this is new legislation just as much as a proposition to vacate one-half of the streets within the city limits and to convert them into parks, and that not being in the interest of retrenchment it is clearly obnoxious to the restriction of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no knowledge of the existing law governing the streets of the District of Columbia, nor does he feel able to state whether this does or does not change existing law, or whether, being a change of law, it would under the rule retrench expenditures. The Chair therefore leaves it to the committee to decide whether the paragraph shall or shall not be stricken out on a motion to that effect. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. MARSH. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all that I have indicated in the bill; all after the word "dollars," in line 272, down to and including line 275.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 14.

Mr. MARSH. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the committee order a vote by tellers?

Mr. HOLMAN. There was no quorum.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that point.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not insisting upon it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I trust the gentleman from Indiana will not raise the point of order that no quorum has voted, but let us go on and get through with this bill without delay.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not insisting upon the point of order myself. I have merely suggested to the Chair that, inasmuch as there was no quorum, the gentleman from Illinois had a right to demand a vote by tellers.

Mr. MARSH. I supposed the Chair would order tellers when the demand was made after the result of the last vote had indicated that there was no quorum present. In order to obtain a vote by tellers I shall, if necessary, raise the point that no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. MARSH and Mr. KETCHAM were appointed tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 17, noes 33.

Mr. MARSH. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 27, noes 57.

Mr. MARSH. I withdraw the point as to the presence of a quorum.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Metropolitan police:

For one major and superintendent, $2,610; one captain, $1,800; one property-clerk, $1,800; one clerk, $1,500; three surgeons, at $450 each; six detectives, at $1,320 each; ten lieutenants, at $1,200 each; twenty sergeants, at $1,140 each; seven acting sergeants, at $1,080 each; seventy-three privates, class one, at $900 each; one hundred and twenty privates, class two, at $1,080 each; sixteen station-keepers, at $516 each; eight laborers, at $420 each; one messenger, $700; one messenger, $500; one major and superintendent, mounted, $360; one captain, mounted, $240; fifty lieutenants, sergeants, and privates, mounted, at $240 each; two drivers, at $300 each; one ambulance-driver, $600; rent of police station-houses and police headquarters, $5,960; for fuel, $1,500; repairs to station-houses, $1,500; miscellaneous and contingent expenses, including stationery, books, telegraphing, photographs, printing and binding, gas, ice, washing, meals for prisoners, furniture and repairs to same, police equipments and repairs to same, beds and bed-clothing, insignia of office, horse, harness, and forage, repairs to van, and detection of crime, $10,000; in all $300,216.

Mr. JACOBS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to line 339, page 15, the words:

"And there shall be hereafter no limitation or restriction as to place of residence of any person applying for appointment upon the said Metropolitan police."

Mr. NEAL. I make the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. JACOBS. Let me explain the amendment first.

Mr. NEAL. I know the argument——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the point of order be stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. NEAL. My point of order is that this is new legislation and does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. JACOBS. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I will read from the statutes governing the District of Columbia, section 373, which I believe is the only section of the Revised Statutes which applies to this matter. That section reads as follows:

There shall be no limitation or restriction of place of residence to any member of the police force, other than residence within the Metropolitan police district.

This does not refer to any member of the police force. It simply refers to the qualifications of the men who go upon the police force; or, in other words, the preliminary qualifications for the positions when a man chooses to become an applicant. It seems to me that in the District of Columbia there is a close corporation so far as this police force is concerned. Under an enforced construction of this statute the commissioners of the District of Columbia have made a regulation by which a man who is an applicant for a position on the police force is required to be a resident of the District for two years. In other words, they say they want an efficient police force under this demand for a good local government; and yet, in the discretion which they claim under this section of the statute, they have seen proper to put up a bar against the whole world except the floating population of the District of Columbia and the tramps of the regular Army. This class of the population is less calculated than any other to furnish a vigorous and efficient police force for the District.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman a question at this point.

Mr. JACOBS. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to inquire of the gentleman if he is of the opinion that out of a population of nearly 180,000 people a sufficient number of able-bodied men cannot be found here to perform the police duties required for this district?

Mr. JACOBS. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois, I would say that the city of Washington and the District of Columbia should have precisely the same facilities for obtaining vigorous, able-bodied and efficient police that other great cities throughout the country have. The best police in the world is said to be the Broadway police of New York, nine-tenths of whom are drawn from country places—country boys—not only of New York, but of every other State of the Union. They are a picked lot of men. But by this restriction to which I have referred the selection of a police force for this District of Columbia is limited to that peculiar and anomalous population which I have mentioned.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The police of Broadway are Irishmen, are they not?

Mr. JACOBS. There is a better population outside of the District of Columbia from which to select, and I think the gentleman thinks so too. The majority of the applicants here, under this construction, are in the first place discharged tramps from the regular Army; and in the next place the countless horde of people who come here and hang around the gates of the Departments hoping to get in, but who find themselves disappointed and without means; and that class is swept in to constitute largely the police force for the District.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to interrupt the gentleman from New York, in order to understand clearly the point of order. The amendment reads:

> And there shall be hereafter no limitation or restriction as to place of residence of any person applying for appointment on said Metropolitan police force.

The Chair does not understand whether or not there is such a provision or restriction of any sort or kind.

Mr. JACOBS. The reply I make to the point of order is simply this: that the section of the Revised Statutes does not refer to men who are candidates for places on the police force. It provides simply that a member of the police force must be a resident of the District of Columbia. If he comes from California and is put on the police force he becomes a resident by virtue of his appointment. Whoever drew that section that—

> There shall be no limitation or restriction of place of residence to any member of the police force other than residence within the Metropolitan police district—

If he intended to give the commissioners power to make a regulation of this kind, that any one appointed on the police force must have been for two years a resident of the District of Columbia, he did not meet that idea.

Mr. ROBESON. Let the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. JACOBS. Section 373 of the Revised Statutes does not apply to that class of people at all. The regulation of the commissioners applies to the candidates asking to be appointed; and I desire to throw down the bars and give the police commissioners in making these appointments access to the whole population of the country.

Mr. ROBESON. The legal situation of this matter is just this: there is now no limitation by law such as is contemplated by this amendment. The abuse or practice at which it is aimed is a regulation of the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. JACOBS. And not authorized by existing law.

Mr. ROBESON. Unauthorized by existing law. I am in favor of the amendment itself, and yet I am afraid my friend from New York will be obliged to agree with me when I say that a new restriction by law where there is now no legal restriction is new legislation and liable to the point of order.

Mr. JACOBS. When the commissioners usurp a power they do not possess under the statute it appears to me proper for the House by express legislation to set them on the right track.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But not by legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from New York whether, if the amendment he proposes should be adopted, any new limitation or restriction or change in the powers now vested in the commissioners would be effected?

Mr. JACOBS. None whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would then ask the gentleman why he desires this amendment to be adopted?

Mr. JACOBS. For the reason that the District commissioners, assuming to act under this section of the Revised Statutes, have enacted this unauthorized regulation by which they bar out everybody who has not been a resident of the District of Columbia for two years; because they have assumed power under this section to do what they are not authorized to do—to make an ordinance that a man before he can be an applicant for a place on the police force shall be a resident of the District for two years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to decide the point of order. It is impossible for the Chair to understand the exact legal status of the police force or the power of the commissioners in reference to appointments on the force. But since the amendment in no way affects the money objects of the bill, the Chair prefers to sustain the point of order on the ground that the amendment is not in his judgment a provision that tends to retrench expenditure, while it must be a provision that the gentleman from New York introduces for the purpose of effecting a new regulation or a change of existing law. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph, under the head "public schools:"

> For officers: For one superintendent, at $3,000; one superintendent, at $2,250; one secretary, at $150; one clerk to committee on accounts, at $300; one clerk to superintendent, at $800; one clerk, at $750; in all, $7,250.

Mr. LYNCH. I wish to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as to the compensation provided in this paragraph for two superintendents of schools, one a superintendent for colored schools and the other a superintendent for white schools. This paragraph recommends a different amount for each superintendent. It occurs to me both superintendents ought to receive the same compensation. I merely wish to have some explanation of this difference.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will state the reason for the discrimination made. For one superintendent there is a salary of $3,000. That is an increase of $300. The reason for the increase is that he has charge of all of the white schools of the District and of the colored schools of the county. It was believed that on that account there ought to be this difference of salary between the two superintendents.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the increase of $300 begin with this bill?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBESON. The point is this: there are two superintendents—a principal superintendent and an assistant superintendent. To the principal superintendent are assigned all the schools of the county and all the white schools of the District. To the assistant are assigned the colored schools of the city.

Mr. BLOUNT. Have the salaries been the same heretofore?

Mr. HISCOCK. The difference before has been $250.

Mr. LYNCH. My information is that so far as the difference in labor between these two superintendents is concerned it is merely nominal. The chief superintendent in fact has no more to do than the other superintendent. The labor, so far as physical work is concerned, amounts to about the same in both cases. In reading the proceedings of the school board of the District of Columbia I find they passed a resolution recommending that there should be no distinction whatever in the compensation of these superintendents. That resolution is in these words:

> Resolved, That in making appropriations for the pay of the superintendents of schools of the District of Columbia no discrimination shall be made in the increase.

It seems to me that the recommendation of the school board ought to have some weight. I know of my own personal knowledge that the superintendent of the colored schools has a great deal of hard labor to do; and while I do not object to the proposed increase for the superintendent of white schools, I think that as each has about the same amount of work the increase should apply to both of them. If the amendment is in order I will move to make the compensation of the other superintendent the same, $3,000.

Mr. HISCOCK. I reply now, with the law before me, to the question of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.] The law as it stands is "for one superintendent at $2,700; for one superintendent at $2,250." We propose in this bill an increase of $300 in the salary of one of the superintendents.

As has been stated by the chairman of the sub-committee, one superintendent has charge of all the white schools in the District and of all the colored schools in the county; the other has charge of the colored schools in the District. The number of white children I believe is about twenty thousand, with over three hundred schools; the number of the colored children is about ten thousand, with about one hundred and fifty schools.

As I have already said, one of the superintendents, in addition to the white schools of the District, has charge of all the colored schools of the county. The members of the Committee on Appropriations who had charge of this bill believe that there should be this difference in the compensation of the superintendents, and therefore we have recommended it.

Mr. LYNCH. I would ask the gentleman this question: Is the change proposed to give the superintendent of the white schools $750 more than is given the other superintendent?

Mr. HISCOCK. It is an increase of $300 in his salary.

Mr. LYNCH. Why not make whatever change is made the same in proportion to each?

Mr. HISCOCK. Because we believe the one superintendent has so much more work to do than the other; that his work is certainly twice as much as the other; that is the truth about it.

Mr. LYNCH. If it is in order, I move to amend the paragraph by striking out "$2,250" and inserting "$3,000" as the salary of the second superintendent.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not desire to make a point of order on the amendment, because I will say in all frankness that I believe the amendment which the committee has brought in here is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I was going to say that I desire to raise a point of order on the increased compensation proposed by the committee.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will not make the point on the amendment to increase the salary of the other superintendent, if the gentleman will fix the sum at $2,500.

Mr. LYNCH. I will accept that suggestion.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I will not make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. LYNCH. The increase, then, will be in proportion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, then, upon the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LYNCH,] to strike out "$2,250" and insert "$2,500," as the salary of the second superintendent.

Mr. HOLMAN. If that is subject to a point of order I desire to make it. I make the point of order upon any proposed increase of salaries in this bill. If this is a proposed increase, I make a point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana state the grounds for his point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. My point of order is this: I understand from the debate (I have had no opportunity to examine the law) that the salaries of these officers are fixed by law.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is too late for the point of order to be made against the provision in the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] reserved the point of order on the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman from Georgia will always take care of himself and his own rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] makes a point of order upon the proposed amendment. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] if there is any law fixing the salaries of these superintendents?

Mr. HISCOCK. I am not aware that there is anything in the organic act of the District that fixes the salaries; but each annual appropriation bill from that time to the present has fixed the salaries of these superintendents at certain amounts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any provision of law which says that the salaries of the superintendents of these schools shall be a certain sum?

Mr. HISCOCK. This is the language, "for one superintendent" so much, which, I suppose, is intended to cover his salary.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much?

Mr. HISCOCK. Three thousand dollars, $2,700, or any other sum.

The CHAIRMAN. That has been in an appropriation bill?

Mr. HISCOCK. In all the appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to say that the proposed amendment does not increase the salary of this officer above that in any former appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from New York to make that statement. The Chair holds that unless there is some law applicable to the District which specifically defines the salary of the superintendent of public instruction at a certain sum, the Chair will hold that when the Committee on Appropriations bring in a bill they are at liberty to recommend the appropriation of any sum they please for the purpose, and it is only for the House to determine upon it. An appropriation bill dies with the current year. There must be some law applicable to the District of Columbia, as there is to the different Departments of the Government, fixing the salaries of these officers, or else it is dependent simply upon the vote of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must respectfully appeal from that decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. And I desire to state the ground of my appeal. I understand the Chair to decide that where no law fixes the salary of a given employé of the Government, each succeeding Congress may increase or diminish his compensation as it may think proper. The salary of this officer has heretofore been $2,500, since 1869 when the office was first created. The Chair, as I understand, holds that it may now be increased to the sum of $3,000 by the simple act of the House, although no law has fixed $3,000 as the compensation of this officer. If that is the ruling of the Chair——

The CHAIRMAN. The declaration of the Chair was that unless there was some provision in some preceding bill specifically fixing the salary of this superintendent the Chair was unable to determine what the law was, and therefore would hold that the salary could be fixed at any time by Congress. If there is any law or statute by which the salary has been fixed specifically, then of course the Chair would hold that an increase of such salary would be a change of law.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from New York stated, as I understood, that the appropriation had been heretofore a specific sum, and that it is now proposed to increase the amount beyond that sum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from New York whether he did not state that since 1869, when the present arrangement was made, the salary of this superintendent had been a specific sum, and that now the proposition is to go beyond that sum?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to add a further statement. This question having been precipitated here, without my having had time to examine it, I now learn for the first time that up to 1874 the salaries were fixed by some general statute; that by the act of June 20, 1874, they were reduced a certain percentage; that subsequently each annual appropriation bill has contained an item in this language, fixing the salary of this officer at $2,700: "For one superintendent, at $2,700."

Mr. BLOUNT. Whatever may be the rule applying to officers of the departments applies also to officers of the District of Columbia. It is within the memory of the Chair that only in the last Congress were the appropriations for the District incorporated into a separate bill, the officers provided for standing in the same position as officers of the several departments of the Government. Now, in reference to officers in the several departments the Chair will remember, as will other gentlemen who have served in previous Congresses, it has been uniformly held that a proposition to increase the amount of any salary in any department of the Government was a change of existing law, and so far as I recollect such propositions have been ruled out with perfect uniformity. At one time, when reductions of the salaries of certain officers in the departments were made, it was claimed that the appropriation bills, while reducing the amounts appropriated, did not change the law at all. This was claimed by certain employés in the departments, and was also claimed in some instances on this floor. But the law officers of the departments have uniformly ruled that those reductions in an appropriation bill were the law as to the salary, and have uniformly refused, as has Congress, to recognize the opposite doctrine. The rulings in the departments and the rulings of chairmen of committees of the whole on various appropriation bills are all to the effect that there can be no increase over the amount previously appropriated for these officials without a change of existing law.

I think gentlemen on the other side of the House will find themselves very much embarrassed if the Chair should now adopt a different ruling from that which has uniformly been made upon this point; for if these previous rulings should now be departed from, it will be perfectly competent to increase upon appropriation bills the salary of every officer in every Department of the Government, one of the very things which the existing rule was intended to avoid. I trust, therefore, that if the ruling on this question is to be changed it may be done with deliberation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have before me the District appropriation act of the last session, in which I find these items:

For one superintendent at $2,700.
For one superintendent, $2,250.

As I understand from the gentleman from New York, these have been the sums heretofore appropriated under existing law for these two officers. Now, the question of order is, can these salaries be increased as proposed?

Mr. COBB. I think I can state the facts in regard to the law in this case. Formerly there was a law allowing to the superintendent a salary of $3,000. In 1874, if I remember rightly—I am in some doubt about the date—a law was passed reducing various salaries 10 per cent. The second superintendent had been entitled, under the general law, to $2,500, which, by this reduction, was brought down to $2,250, while the salary of the other superintendent was reduced to $2,700. Since that time the salaries have been appropriated for upon the basis of that reduction.

Now, if I may be permitted a further remark which I know is not legitimate in connection with the point of order, I desire to state that Mr. Wilson is one superintendent and Mr. Cook the other, the former the superintendent of the white schools, the latter of the colored. Mr. Wilson this year has under his charge 14,321 pupils actually in attendance at the public schools; whereas Mr. Cook has under his charge only 6,445 pupils. Now if the number of pupils under the charge of these respective commissioners may be taken as an indication of the labor performed by them, it will be seen that their labors are very unequal. Besides, Mr. Wilson, whose salary it is proposed to raise, has charge of the schools outside of the city, in the rural portion of the District, in addition to the 14,321 pupils in the city.

It occurs to me, therefore, that his duties must necessarily be more onerous than those of Mr. Cook. Whether these salaries are too high or too low, there is certainly inequality in the amount of labor performed without any corresponding difference in salary. When there are in the one case 14,321 pupils as against 6,445 in the other, the amount of labor performed by these commissioners must certainly be very different. One has twice as much to do as the other. If inquired into, I think it will be seen that Mr. Wilson now performs more than twice the labor performed by Mr. Cook, because he has more than twice the number of children under his superintendence and care.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say on this matter, that if it were true, as it was declared, that there had been no office created, and there was no law upon the statute-book regulating and defining the duties and compensation of this office, and that this was simply an employé provided to be paid from year to year in the discretion of Congress, that it was simply provided in a clause of an appropriation bill for an office the duties and compensation of which were not set out in any law upon the statute-book, then the Chair would hold it was precisely like other items in this bill, and particularly such as relate to charitable institutions, where in one year allowance is made of $5,000, in another $10,000, and in another $7,000. In that case it would be entirely competent for the committee and the House to change the amount of the appropriation; and so if these officers to which special reference is now made were in a like condition, then it would be competent for the committee and the House to change the appropriation in reference to them.

The Chair, however, has been informed since the point was first made that there is a law on this subject fixing the salary of this particular officer and defining what shall be his duties. Therefore, if the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his appeal the Chair will recall his previous decision and rule on the subject in view of the new light thrown upon the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair then modifies his decision, and rules, as the point of order has been made, that any increase of the amount provided by law for this salary must be stricken out.

Mr. HISCOCK. That reduces the salary of the superintendent from $3,000 to $2,700, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. It reduces it to whatever amount is provided for by law at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

For addition to school-building on site owned by the District near Howard University, to be completed by the 1st day of September next, $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. COBB. I move to add the following proviso:

And from and after the 15th day of July, 1882, the board of school trustees of the District of Columbia shall consist of nine members only.

Mr. HISCOCK. That proviso is accepted on the part of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS EXPENSES.

For repairs of hay-scales, $500; for rent of District offices, $3,600; for general advertising, $5,000; for books for register of wills, printing, checks, damages, and miscellaneous items not otherwise provided for, $3,000; in all, $12,100.

Mr. YOUNG. I wish to call attention to an item in this paragraph which certainly needs some explanation. Two hundred dollars was appropriated in 1881 for the repair of hay-scales, and now in this bill we have an appropriation of $500 for repairs of hay-scales. I want to know where those hay-scales are located and how many are appropriated for.

The CHAIRMAN. What amendment does the gentleman move?

Mr. YOUNG. In order that I may have some explanation of this matter I will move to strike out the words "for repairs of hay-scales, $500."

Mr. HISCOCK. I can only say, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Ohio, that this item has been provided for in all preceding appropriations for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRIGGS. If it is not necessary is it not time to leave it out?

Mr. HISCOCK. It is regularly estimated for, and comes to the Committee on Appropriations, not only indorsed by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, but by the Secretary of the Treasury.

I can say that the sub-committee did not visit these hay-scales, and therefore are not able precisely to locate them. Nor did they investigate as to how many this particular item includes, relying as they did on the correctness of the estimates. The committee have no reason to believe it is not entirely proper and that the sum here provided is not absolutely necessary.

Mr. YOUNG. This appropriation for repairs of hay-scales seems to me to be an exorbitant charge. I do not know how it is in the District of Columbia, but the Fairbanks Brothers, who manufacture these hay-scales, will put up a new hay-scale in Cincinnati for $250, and in Nebraska or Kansas for $275. It does strike me, therefore, that $500 for the repairs of hay-scales here is too much. It is about twice and a half as much as hay-scales can be furnished by the manufacturer.

Mr. HISCOCK. There are five or six of these hay-scales maintained in the city, one I believe in every market; and this item is to provide for their repair.

Mr. PAYSON. Has the appropriation been sufficient heretofore?

Mr. HISCOCK. It has. This is an annual appropriation which has been kept all along for repairs for these various hay-scales.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, to strike out the item providing for the repair of hay-scales, to which he has referred.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. NEAL. I ask consent of the committee to go back to page 18, line 431, and insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That no more than the market prices shall be paid for fuel, and all bids above the market price shall be rejected.

Mr. HISCOCK. There is no objection on the part of the committee to that amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask my friend from Ohio if there is occasion for that amendment?

Mr. NEAL. I will state, Mr. Chairman, to the committee that when it was reported to the House by the commissioner that there was a deficiency in fuel I inquired as to the price they had been paying for it. I was informed that there were but two bidders under the advertisement, and that the sum paid was between six and seven dollars a ton for coal. I saw subsequently a private party who buys largely of the same class of fuel, and I was informed by him that he had paid but little over five dollars a ton, which was the market price. The commissioners were compelled by the law to accept the lowest bid which was offered, and there being no other bidders they had to accept the lowest of the two, which was from a dollar to a dollar and a half more than the market price.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KETCHAM. I ask consent to go back to page 21, line 493, and insert, after the words "three thousand," the words, "eight hundred;" so as to read "three thousand eight hundred dollars;" which makes its conform to the existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KETCHAM. If necessary, I shall move that the aggregate footing up of the bill be changed to conform to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The necessary correction will be made in the aggregate of the bill.

Mr. YOUNG. I ask consent to go back to line 353, with a view of offering an amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let us know what the amendment is.

Mr. YOUNG. It is on the item of forage.

Mr. BROWNE. I object.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the objection will be withdrawn, for it is apparent from the statement which has been made on this floor that a considerable sum over the market price has been paid for fuel. Now, if that be the case, and if the gentleman desires to investigate another question where the same principle may come in, I hope he will be permitted to do so. If there is any improper administration we ought to know it.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio to go back to the line which he has indicated for the purpose of offering an amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG. The bill calls for "forage, $7,000." Last year the amount appropriated for this purpose for the thirty-five horses belonging to the fire department was only $4,500.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. YOUNG. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will submit his amendment.

Mr. YOUNG. I move to strike out "$7,000" and insert "$4,500;" so that if amended it will read "forage, $4,500."

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. YOUNG. I believe I have the floor in the first place on the amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG. I understand there are thirty-five horses only in the service of the fire department of the District of Columbia. Now, it is estimated that the necessary forage for thirty-five horses, at a cost, we will assume, say of eighty cents per bushel for corn and twenty dollars a ton for hay, which is about the market price, will consume the amount here appropriated. Upon that basis of cost for fifty-two weeks of the year the total amount would be only about four thousand two hundred and twenty-two dollars. Surely, corn can be purchased for eighty cents a bushel, and hay for twenty dollars a ton. Now, why the committee ask for $7,000 for this purpose is what I would like to have explained.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. YOUNG. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. Would the gentleman be willing to incorporate an amendment similar to that offered by the gentleman from Ohio in relation to coal? Would it not be satisfactory that all supplies shall be purchased at market prices?

Mr. YOUNG. I do not understand how the question of coal can apply to this one of forage.

Mr. BLOUNT. I mean with reference to the purchase of forage that it shall not exceed market prices, the same limitation as was put on the purchase of fuel.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker pro tempore resumed the chair.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill (H. R. No. 869) for the relief of Thomas J. Wharton; also that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 1604) to establish an assay office at Deadwood, in the Territory of Dakota, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. YOUNG. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have estimated the cost of keeping thirty-five horses on the basis of the army ration of fourteen pounds of corn and twelve pounds of hay. In relation to the price of corn, I will say that the calculation I have made was on the basis of eighty-five cents a bushel instead of eighty cents; eighty five cents being the market price in New York to-day, and hay $20 a ton. At that rate $4,200 would be enough to feed thirty-five horses for one year, but I am allowing by this amendment $4,500. And I would like to know why the bill has been presented to us allowing $7,000 for forage. My objection is that it calls for $2,500 more than is absolutely necessary, at high rates, to feed the thirty-five horses. If the gentleman from New York has any explanation to make on that subject I will be glad to hear from him.

Mr. HISCOCK. All I can say in the way of explanation or reply is this: to start with, I am not aware that thirty-five is the maximum number of horses there. I say frankly that I did not investigate to learn whether there were thirty-five or forty-five.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would ask the chairman of the committee how much was given for this purpose in the last bill?

Mr. YOUNG. Four thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. HISCOCK I desire also to say that this keeping of horses is let by contract twice a year to the lowest bidder. Proposals are accepted, the lowest bidder receiving the contract for the support and maintenance of these horses. It is an open competition. And at the contract prices, with the contract advertised and let, as I have said, twice a year, there was a deficiency this year of I think $3,000. The amount we have provided for in this bill is substantially the appropriation of last year, with the deficiency which we are going to provide for.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know the chairman of the committee desires to do whatever the interests of the Government may require; and I ask him if it is not true as to coal that coal was let out to the lowest bidder, there being but two bidders, and that the Government paid a dollar a ton, or at any rate some amount considerably over the market price, and that if there was a deficiency that is the explanation for that deficiency? And I ask him further if that is not the identical state of facts in relation to the item of forage?

Mr. HISCOCK. If there is such an explanation as that I do not know it. For the first time I have heard that stated in private conversation on this floor to-day. But, sir, I know that statements of that kind are sometimes loosely made, and how much reliance can be put upon them the gentleman from Georgia can judge as well as myself.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. HISCOCK. If the gentleman will allow me one moment, I wish to say the most that Congress can do in reference to this matter is to surround the administration of these Departments with all the safeguards possible; and that has been done in every conceivable case where supplies are purchased. Where there are large quantities purchased the law, as I understand, provides they are to be purchased under contract, the contract to be awarded to the lowest bidder.

Mr. KETCHAM. That is done in all cases.

Mr. HISCOCK. That, we are informed, has been done, and upon a mere assertion being made here on the floor that there was collusion, or fraud, or more paid for coal than ought to be, we cannot change an appropriation bill. We have got to give enough to give effect to the law, we have got to give enough to administer the Government under the statutes which have been enacted.

We know that these are large horses, and I have no doubt they are kept up to the highest point in the most expensive way to secure their highest efficiency; and it is very likely they are supported more expensively than Army horses are. I do not know how that may be. I only know this, that under contracts which have been made in accordance with the existing laws we have recommended this appropriation.

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SPEER. I move to strike out the last word.

I think the House can better afford to strike out other appropriations rather than to reduce the appropriation for the very efficient fire department of this city. I live near one of the engine-houses, and it has been my pleasure to carefully examine the workings of the department. One of the foremen informed me that with the best care that could possibly be taken of the large and fine horses used on the engines they lasted on an average only three years. This is not remarkable, for the horse, like the fireman, must do rapid and dangerous work. It would astonish gentlemen to know how almost instantaneously after the first stroke of the fire-alarm is given that these gallant firemen are dashing out with the trucks and engines in the direction of the fire at the full speed at which their horses can take them. Sir, it would excite the admiration of any man who can appreciate the physical powers of the man, or the noble qualities of the horse.

It has been stated by the chairman of the committee that the appropriation last year for this purpose was $4,500, and there was a deficiency, I believe he states, of $3,500.

Mr. HISCOCK. Nearly that.

Mr. SPEER. So that the appropriation of $7,000 for this year does not amount to the appropriation for last year and the deficiency, which was necessarily voted. I think it would be the worst form of economy to cripple in any way the efficiency of that splendid department, and thus weaken its ability to protect the property of the Government and the lives and property of our citizens.

Mr. BLOUNT was recognized.

Mr. YOUNG. I asked permission a moment ago to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio before the vote is taken.

Mr. BLOUNT. I trust the chairman of the committee will agree to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] with an additional amendment such as is offered by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia in reference to coal. I think it is but reasonable, and I am quite sure that the gentleman from New York is ready to agree to anything that is reasonable.

Mr. HISCOCK. I am entirely willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL.] I am unwilling to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. YOUNG.]

Mr. BLOUNT. We have just had a statement in reference to coal that under the law the contract for coal was let to the lowest bidder and that more than a dollar a ton above the market price had been paid for coal.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, recognizing the fact that there is some difficulty about the matter, says to this committee, "I have not heard anything about it until to-day, and that was in private conversation." Now, I want to say to my friend that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB,] who for several years has had charge of this bill, has investigated this very item of coal, and finds that what the gentleman states is a mere matter of rumor is a matter of absolute verity, and that there has been paid for coal, as alleged here in debate, an amount which was above the market price.

And I want to say to my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, [Mr. NEAL,] who is presumed to be more familiar with local matters here than any other gentleman on this floor, except perhaps his colleagues on that committee, has informed this House that that statement is actually true; and in reference to his statement we have agreed without any dissent to an amendment offered by him, that while contracts for coal shall be let to the lowest bidder hereafter, it shall be with the understanding that even then there shall be no excess paid over the market price.

We now come to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. YOUNG.] He tells us that the same state of things exists in reference to the horses of the fire department. We appropriated last year the sum of $4,500, about the amount usually appropriated heretofore, and we are now told that there was a deficiency. You are told that while the contracts have been let to the lowest bidder they have been far beyond what private parties in the District are obliged to pay for like services. That being true, then of necessity this deficiency ought not to have arisen; of necessity this estimate based on this defect in the law is excessive.

I hope that my friend from New York will agree to a reduction of the sum here proposed, with an amendment such as that proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NEAL,] and let us test the matter in that way. We will be back here next winter.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] if he has made a computation upon the basis of thirty-five horses, and knows how much per horse it would be?

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to say to the gentleman that I did not make any computation about coal, and I have not made any about horses. But the gentleman from Ohio has stated that he has made a computation, and that being the case, unless the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will state that he has investigated the matter and finds a different result, I think it is right to accept an amendment making the appropriation for horses the same as has been allowed heretofore, and which I think is ample.

Mr. CAMP. I desire to inquire if there are thirty-five horses in this District employed in the fire department, and $7,000 in money appropriated for their keeping, is not that at the rate of just $16.66⅔ per month for each horse, and does it not cost private parties in any stable in this city for the boarding of a horse from $20 to $30 per month?

Mr. YOUNG. That is true; but I would say——

Mr. CAMP. And I would also ask the gentleman if he has not left out of his calculation the expenses of grooming, &c.?

Mr. YOUNG. One question at a time.

Mr. CAMP. You might as well take the two together.

Mr. YOUNG. The gentleman forgets that we pay $6,400 in addition to that amount for hostlers to take care of these horses.

Mr. HISCOCK. How many hostlers are there?

Mr. YOUNG. There are eight of them at $800 a year each. Now let the gentleman add that amount to the amount for keeping, and allow for stable-room and care of all kinds, veterinary surgeons, &c. There is no way of estimating that at all; it is simply absurd to attempt to estimate it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] said that he did not know how many horses the District owns. If he will turn to page 64 of the report of the commissioners of the District of Columbia for the year 1881 he will find exactly how many horses there are. There are thirty-two horses in service and three not in service.

Now look at the figures for keeping these horses. As estimated by me, it is $2.32 a week for each horse, or, in other words, $81.20 for thirty-five horses. Then add to that the proportion of $6,400 paid for hostlers, entirely outside of the fire department, to take care of these horses, and then see whether there is any extravagance in that department, and whether there cannot be some economy practiced in regard to it.

Take an Army horse. The ration of an Army horse is judged to be sufficient by the best judges of horses in the world; and they do not get in the field half the ration that is allowed by law. An Army horse is allowed to draw fourteen pounds of corn and twelve pounds of hay each day. Now I venture to say that there is not in the fire department to-day in the city of Washington a horse that gets that amount of feed. Where does it go to?

In the first place, the District commissioners have no right to spend one dollar beyond the appropriation of $4,500 which was made for this purpose. In the second place, the Committee on Appropriations has no right to smuggle in this bill an appropriation of $2,500 more than the actual cost of keeping these horses in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has expired. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. YOUNG,] to strike out "$7,000" and insert "$4,500" in the pending paragraph.

Mr. HISCOCK. I certainly hope if the reduction is made the law will be amended in some way so as to get rid of the contract system. I am entirely willing that we shall provide for the keeping of these horses by contract with the lowest bidder; but in my judgment the result will be a blow at the fire department, which is very sensitive when you make this reduction.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. YOUNG; and upon a division there were—ayes 26, noes 36.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. NEAL. At the suggestion of the chairman of the sub-committee, and by consent of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I ask permission to modify the amendment which I offered to come in after line 431, and to transfer it to the bottom of page 21. The modified amendment I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That in the purchase of all articles provided for in this bill no more than the market price shall be paid for any such article, and all bids for any of such articles above the market price shall be rejected.

There was no objection, and the amendment was modified accordingly.

The Clerk read as follows:

WATER DEPARTMENT.

SEC. 2. That the following sums are hereby appropriated, to be paid wholly from the revenues of the water department of the District of Columbia, unless otherwise noted:

For one water registrar, $2,400; one chief clerk, $1,500; one clerk, $1,400; two clerks, at $1,200 each; one clerk, $900; one superintendent, $1,600; one messenger, $600; one inspector, at $3 per day, $939; contingent expenses, including books, stationery, forage, advertising, printing and miscellaneous items, $2,400; engineers and firemen, coal, material, and for high service in Washington and Georgetown, pipe-distribution to high and low service, including public hydrants, fire-plugs, replacing the nine-inch with ten-inch fire-plugs, material and labor, repairing and laying new mains, lowering mains, $49,501.50; for laying twelve-inch water-mains, with proper fire-plugs and connections, for the proper protection of the Government Printing Office, $5,600, of which the United States shall pay one half, and $2,800 is hereby appropriated for this purpose; interest and sinking-fund on water-stock bonds, $44,610; in all, $111,050.50: Provided, That the fiscal year of the water department of the District of Columbia shall be made to conform to the regular fiscal year of the General Government; and to carry this proviso into effect the commissioners are empowered and directed to levy and collect water rates for the six months beginning January 1, 1883, from and after the expiration of which time the rates shall be levied and collected annually: And provided further, That hereafter the Treasurer, as ex-officio sinking-fund commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase any of the funded indebtedness of the District of Columbia for the sinking fund authorized to be created for the redemption and payment of the water-stock bonds of the District of Columbia, as in his opinion may be for the best interests of said District of Columbia.

During the reading of the foregoing section—

Mr. YOUNG said: I desire to go back to line 492, on page 21, to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will withhold his request for the present, the Chair, when the reading of the bill is concluded, will submit it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I object to going back.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That hereafter all moneys appropriated for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, together with all revenues of the District of Columbia from taxes or otherwise, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as required by the provisions of section 4 of an act approved June 11, 1878, and shall be drawn therefrom only on requisition of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, (except that the moneys appropriated for interest and the sinking-fund shall be drawn therefrom only on the requisition of the Treasurer of the United States,) such requisition specifying the appropriation upon which the same is drawn; and in no case shall such appropriation be exceeded either in requisition or expenditure; and the accounts for all disbursements of the commissioners of said District shall be made monthly to the accounting officers of the Treasury by the auditor of the District of Columbia on vouchers certified by the commissioners, as now required by law: Provided, That said commissioners shall not make requisitions upon the appropriations from the Treasury of the United States for a larger amount during any fiscal year than they make on the appropriations arising from the revenues of said District, including one-half of all general taxes paid in drawback certificates as required by the third section of the act approved June 27, 1879, entitled "An act fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of general taxes and assessments for special improvements now due to the District of Columbia, and for a revision of assessments for special improvements, and for other purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the bill is now concluded. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] asks unanimous consent to go back to a part of the bill which has been passed, in order to offer an amendment.

Mr. KETCHAM and Mr. BROWNE objected.

Mr. YOUNG. I cannot understand why objection should be made to any member on the floor trying to amend this bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KETCHAM] that his bill has been subjected to very little criticism, and he should not object to hearing the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG. The bill was read very rapidly, and I had no opportunity to offer this amendment. I must vote against the bill unless we are allowed free opportunity to discuss and amend the different items.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to going back to a previous section of the bill, as proposed by the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not understand that my colleague [Mr. KETCHAM] has withdrawn his objection.

Mr. BROWNE. How often is it necessary for a gentleman to say that he objects?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana object?

Mr. BROWNE. I do, most distinctly.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from Ohio is objected to.

Mr. KETCHAM. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it be passed as amended.

Mr. KLOTZ. I intended to offer an amendment to line 5 in reference to the water department; but on the suggestion of the Chairman that the bill be read through I withheld the amendment.

Mr. KETCHAM. I insist on my motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that the last paragraph of the bill is still open to amendment. So long as any gentleman desires to submit an amendment to that paragraph it is certainly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has moved that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. But a motion to rise and report the bill cannot deprive any member of the right to offer an amendment to the last paragraph. If the motion could have that effect, it might be made instantly on the reading of the last paragraph.

Mr. HISCOCK. The motion to rise and report the bill to the House is in order; and that is the motion now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. A simple motion that the committee rise is at all times in order; but the motion of the gentleman from New York is that the committee rise and report the bill to the House as amended. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KLOTZ] states, as the Chair understands, that he was seeking recognition to offer an amendment to the last section of the bill, when the gentleman from New York made his motion. The motion to rise and report the bill cannot preclude a motion to amend the last paragraph.

Mr. KLOTZ. I move to amend by striking out, in line 5 of the section in regard to the water department, "$2,400" and inserting "$3,000" as the salary of the water registrar.

Mr. HISCOCK. I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order. In the first place we have passed that section of the bill, and in the second place the amendment proposes to change existing law and increase expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, we have not heard the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that he had an amendment to offer to the last section of the bill. Upon presentation of the amendment it was found to apply to line 5 of section 2. The point of order was made that that section had been passed and that an amendment could only be in order to section 3. The Chair sustained the point of order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KETCHAM.]

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to ask a question of the Chair. While the Clerk was reading the bill I rose and asked the attention of the Chair to an amendment which I desired to offer. The Chair requested me to wait until the Clerk had concluded reading, stating that he would then recognize me. When the reading was finished I addressed the Chair to offer my amendment, which was objected to. Now, the Chair cut me off at the proper time for offering the amendment, and by the objection subsequently made I am cut off entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that he would recognize the gentleman from Ohio at the conclusion of the reading of the bill.

Mr. YOUNG. Precisely.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did then recognize the gentleman;

but unanimous consent for the offering of the amendment was refused. The Chair did all he could for the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to ask whether in the consideration of a bill in Committee of the Whole it is absolutely necessary to get unanimous consent for the offering of an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary to get unanimous consent for the offering of an amendment when it is in order; but if the section to which the amendment relates has been passed, unanimous consent is necessary in order to recur to that section. It was on this ground that the Chair did not entertain the amendment, very much to his own regret, because personally he would have been very glad to recognize the gentleman.

The question being taken on the motion that the committee rise and report the bill to the House as amended, it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. HASKELL reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 5664) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, and to recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. KETCHAM. I call for the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The question being on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read the third time,

Mr. KETCHAM called for the previous question.

Mr. YOUNG. I wish to put to the Chair a parliamentary inquiry—whether this bill is not now subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not subject to amendment pending the call for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. KETCHAM called the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon the passage of this bill the question must, under the rules, be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 134, nays 13, not voting 144; as follows:

Mr. HISCOCK. You need not withdraw it; I will be responsible.

Mr. MULDROW. I must withdraw it.

Mr. ROBESON. I object, if it leaves us without a quorum.

Mr. CONVERSE. These pairs are all made on political questions, and they should be so reported.

Mr. CANNON. I am paired with Mr. SCALES, but on the understanding that it was not to break a quorum.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. JORGENSEN, but upon the understanding between us I am entitled to vote.

Mr. HOUK. On leaving the House an hour ago I paired with Mr. GEDDES, and that pair was transferred to my colleague, Mr. MCMILLIN. To make a quorum I take the responsibility of voting.

On motion of Mr. CAMP, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. KETCHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to call up for consideration the special order, but yield for a moment to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMP,] who wishes to offer a resolution.

ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK.

Mr. CAMP. I desire to offer a resolution to which I think there will be no objection, and ask its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and is hereby, authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to Frank Galt, as assistant journal clerk, the per diem compensation of committee clerks from March 1, 1882, to the end of the present session of Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. That measure is no doubt entirely correct and proper, but I should like to have some explanation of the necessity for it.

Mr. CAMP. The gentleman to whom this refers has been performing the duties of assistant journal clerk. He has rendered the service, but for some reason which I do not know is unable to draw his pay without this resolution.

Mr. KLOTZ. Was he ever appointed to that position?

Mr. CAMP. I presume he was. He has rendered the service and has been paid for a part of the time. This makes provision for the payment that is due up to this time, and from now to the end of the session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I must make objection to it unless I can understand its object.

Mr. CAMP. Then I ask its reference to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WICKLIFFE COOPER.

Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 208) correcting the military record of Wickliffe Cooper, deceased, late major Seventh Cavalry, brevet colonel United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PLATE-PRINTING PRESSES, TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FLOWER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to report to this House, in addition to the information already requested of him in the matter of work done on steam power plate-printing presses in the Treasury Department, the original estimate of the cost of said machines now in use, together with their actual cost; a detailed statement of all repairs and all other expenses thereon; the number of such presses now in operation; the number of impressions printed on the several presses during their operation up to date, and the actual cost of such work from every cause; together with copies of all official reports made on said presses prior to and since their introduction to the Department.

COMMON PRIME MERIDIAN.

Mr. FLOWER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 209) to authorize the President of the United States to call an international conference to fix on and recommend for universal adoption a common prime meridian to be used in the reckoning of longitude and in the regulation of time throughout the world; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. REED. I must now insist on the call for the regular order. I was perfectly willing to yield to gentlemen to a reasonable extent, but I see the House is fairly bristling over with business, and I hope gentlemen will excuse me for not yielding any further. I beg therefore to call up the special order to which I have referred, the Geneva award bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order of the House fixing the special order to which the gentleman refers.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. No. 4197) re-establishing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award be taken from the Committee of the Whole and be considered in the House as in committee on April 11, and thence from day to day until disposed of, but not to interfere with the revenue and general appropriation bills, the tariff-commission bill, and the bill referring private claims to the Court of Claims.

Mr. CRAPO. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill how much time he thinks will be occupied in the consideration of this measure? I ask the question with reference to the bill which I proposed to insist upon considering as the next business in order.

Mr. REED. I am not able to state exactly, though I am in hopes of being able to close the matter to-morrow. I cannot answer more definitely, because the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HAMMOND,] representing the other side, is not present; and it would not be fair to say in his absence how much time will be consumed in the discussion of the matter.

Mr. CRAPO. I wish to say when this bill has been brought to a vote I shall demand the consideration of the bill to extend the charters of national banks.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention at the present time to address the House on the subject which is now before us. I intended to reserve what I desired to say for the close of the debate; but it has been deemed best under all the circumstances that I should make a statement to the House, explaining as briefly and simply as I may be able all the views which are entertained by the committee in regard to the distribution of the award which is covered by this bill. I shall not be voluminous in that presentation. I shall not deal very greatly with dates and figures, but shall endeavor to present the great salient and important facts, together with the line of argument which the committee deemed necessary to fortify the conclusions to which they have come.

While the facts connected with this award are scattered over a large number of volumes, some eighteen or twenty, they are nevertheless in reality few in number so far as they are of controlling influence; and if the House will be kind enough to listen to me I will endeavor to set them forth in such fashion as may aid their judgment, if possible, and not becloud it.

It is perfectly well known that during the late war of the rebellion a large number of ships preyed upon our commerce which were fitted out at British or colonial ports during the progress of the war; and while those privateers were sweeping our commerce from the seas our Secretary of State and our minister to England made various representations and took various grounds, upon which they stated that they should ultimately cause reclamations to be made. But at the time we were in no position to insist on anything that might be called our rights.

After the close of the war efforts were begun at once to repair what we deemed to be our great injury resulting from the action of these cruisers. We charged upon England that she was responsible for the devastation of our commerce which had been caused. We declared that her recognition of belligerency was premature and legally blameworthy, and had contributed to our disaster. During all the diplomatic correspondence on the subject we insisted upon that with iteration upon iteration. When Reverdy Johnson was minister to England he concluded two conventions to settle these claims, which in the meantime had been filed in the Department of State by each person who thought he had a claim.

The first convention, which was known as the Johnson-Stanley convention, simply provided for a settlement of private claims, individual claims against Great Britain; it provided that a commission should be formed, which should settle and dispose of the individual claims. That convention was rejected on account of some criticisms as to its details made by the Secretary of State.

Thereupon, a month or two afterward, a new convention, called the Johnson-Clarendon convention, was accepted by the Secretary of State, after having been negotiated by our minister and the British minister of foreign affairs. That convention when it was submitted to the Senate, being simply a treaty for the settlement of individual claims without taking into account any national loss, was rejected by the Senate, and rejected upon two grounds: first, that the convention contained no apology for the conduct of Great Britain, which we deemed unsuitable, which we deemed violative of our honor as a nation; and second, because it contained no proposition to submit the claims as a whole as a national loss to a tribunal for decision. The Senate rejected this by an overwhelming majority, and from that time there was an end of private claims as such presented by the Government of the United States.

From that time on the history of the transaction is the history of an affair between nations. It ceased to be an affair on the part of individuals against Great Britain and became an affair of the United States against the nation of Great Britain. In that state of affairs Great Britain sent some negotiators here to Washington and we sent plenipotentiaries here to meet them; and those people got together and drafted a treaty, which was called the treaty of Washington, which was adopted finally June 27, 1871.

That treaty of Washington, unlike those two conventions which I have described, was not an affair of individual claims. It was a broad national transaction. It contained in it not only a provision that individual claims, outside of the Alabama claims, should be considered by a separate commission, but it provided that the Alabama claims should be referred to a tribunal, and that that tribunal should be governed by three new rules of international law, which three new rules were thereafter to control the action of the United States and of Great Britain in all future time, together with the action of such nations as they pledged themselves to get to agree with them finally if they could.

The establishment of these three rules and the apology, which, I forgot to state, was also tendered in the treaty, and the provision that the whole claim should be referred in bulk in a particular event to the tribunal at Geneva, was a transaction which was made all together. It was a transaction which was one and the same; it was a transaction which was made as a whole; and whatever advantage the United States got was paid for by compromise by the surrender of other claims and grounds of claim. Among other things which disappeared when that treaty was made was what was in the correspondence during the war between the Secretary of State and the British minister made the most prominent ground for reclamation against Great Britain, namely, the declaration that we should hold Great Britain responsible for a premature recognition of belligerency; and it disappeared because the English Government declined, and very properly, to submit to any tribunal on earth other than their own government the propriety of recognizing belligerency. They claimed that that was an attribute of sovereignty which no nation had a right to question, and we were obliged to waive that. We waived it for the sake of making a treaty and as a part of the terms which entered into the whole situation.

Such being the state of affairs, the tribunal at Geneva assembled, and there was presented before them a series of claims made up of various items, every man in the United States presenting everything which he deemed to be a claim, no matter what it was. Among those claims were claims for the destruction of vessels; and you will notice that the claim for the destruction of vessels involved questions of testimony as to how much property was destroyed; and among the ways of presenting it was a presentation of the claims of insurance companies. But of course as between the nations the only question was how many vessels were lost. As to the price of them and how the price was made up, that was purely and simply a question of evidence. Then in addition to that the nation presented claims for the continuance of the war and for the enhancement of war premiums. It also presented claims for the destruction of all property by all classes of cruisers.

Now, I want to deal with this subject fully and frankly. The tribunal decided that the claims for enhancement of war premiums could not be recognized by it. It also decided that it would not consider the claims for the prolongation of the war, and the United States acquiesced in that.

Now, let me call your attention to the attitude of the United States upon this subject. The United States had established certain rules, and it wanted those rules construed; but it did not want them construed so as to hold us to a liability of great damage in the future.

Why? Because the United States in the future was going to be a neutral power from its very situation, and hence the United States did not desire to have these rules construed too sharply against neutrals.

If these rules should be construed too sharply against Great Britain, and we should under that construction get a million or more dollars, then the next time the discussion would come up on our liabilities, and you will at once see that we would probably in the future be in danger of being heavily and severely mulcted ourselves.

Hence we had an interest there different from individual claimants. The individual claimant wanted to get the greatest amount of money that he could get. But the United States wanted him to get it only upon principles which would be perfectly safe for the United States in their future history. Hence you see the whole bent of the argument on the part of the Government of the United States must necessarily have been turned toward giving these rules such a construction as would protect us in the future against a danger, somewhat to the detriment of the claim for what had been done in the past.

It was necessary for us not only to have these rules construed for the parties that would be represented there but that they should be construed in reference to the future history of the country. Hence the United States very readily acceded to the proposition that Great Britain was not to be held liable for the prolongation of the war, because we did not dare ourselves to enter upon that field of possible liability. It was not for our interest to do it, and we refused to do it.

So, also, when it came to the question of exculpated and inculpated cruisers. The question of exculpated and inculpated cruisers was simply this: with regard to the inculpated cruisers Great Britain was declared to have been lacking in due and proper diligence, whereas with regard to the exculpated cruisers she was released of every liability on the ground that she had used just such diligence as was proper. And you can see that it was not for our interest to have that rule drawn too strictly, because when we come to act as a neutral power it might be damaging to us if too heavy a load of diligence was thrust upon us. That is the interest which we as a nation had, an interest which modified our demands in regard to these claims.

Consequently when we got through we were bound to ourselves distribute the award in a manner that would take into account the situation under which we got it. So our Government always insisted from the very beginning that it should have the right and privilege of distributing this award, and we insisted upon it for the reason that in no other way could justice be done.

Let me give you a simple illustration. Suppose a lot of clients go to an attorney and say, "We want you to take our cases and manage them all in a lump. You have some interest of your own which you must look after; now, take our cases and manage them also." He says, "I will do so, but I am going to look out for my own interest as well as for yours; and when I get through I will divide whatever I get among you as I think fair. Now, will you consent to that?" They say that they will consent to it. Now, if he is an honest man and divides whatever he may obtain upon fair and reasonable principles, what complaint can be made against him?

Under these circumstances there is nothing to send to a court. you will perceive that we must come right to the principles of legislation; we must dictate and determine the principles upon which this award shall be distributed.

While the report of the minority of the committee in this case undertakes to argue that there ought to be a court, if it argues anything it argues that this money ought to go to the insurance companies. And I may be asked, why should it not? The answer is very plain.

The history of these insurance companies shows beyond dispute that they charged to those who went to them for war risks (and mind you the war risks were kept distinct and separate from the others) such a sum as would not only enable them to recoup every dollar they paid out but to make from 35 to 40 per cent. dividend besides. And now they ask us to pay the very amount of money in consideration of which they actually obtained 35 per cent. dividend. I say that is of itself and per se an absurdity; and that anybody who undertakes to advocate that doctrine has got to face the idea that the doctrine of subrogation, which at best was only a doctrine of odds and ends, has got to be applied to the case of recoupment all along the line, and they must make a law to do it.

Now, these gentlemen, in order to escape responsibility, say let us go to court. I say the court will decide in favor of the insurers or it will not. If it will not decide in favor of the insurers, then that is the way that Congress has always decided and will decide again. If it will decide in favor of the insurance companies, then I say that I do not want to give them a chance to do that. That is very simple and plain. We are the law-making power; and we must move in this matter before anybody can touch this money. If we make provision for its distribution, we must lay down just principles which shall guide the distribution.

Now, the first class of people to whom we ought to do justice is the class injured by the exculpated cruisers. Why? Because the United States for its own purposes insisted upon a more lax definition of the rule, which speaks of "due diligence;" it did this for its own interest hereafter. Therefore, these exculpated cruisers to a large extent escaped. You may accept or you may not accept the argument made by the Senator from Vermont, at a previous session of Congress, that it is the duty of Congress to protect American shipping on the seas, and that we can use this money for that purpose.

We provide next that the war-premium men shall receive their portion of this money. Why do we so provide? I will state the argument which I use upon this subject. When we made payments for vessels that were destroyed, if a man's vessel was worth $40,000 and it was insured for $30,000 and he obtained his insurance-money, then instead of paying him $40,000 we paid him only $10,000. Why did we not pay him the other $30,000? Simply because we were unwilling that any man should be paid twice. So the $30,000 was saved to the fund, and is there now.

Do you say that this should be paid to the insurance companies? I answer no; the insurance companies have already got back that $30,000, with 35 per cent. besides. Where did they get it? From the war-premium men. These insurance companies charged so immense a premium that when they got through they had actually recouped their loss and paid themselves 30 or 40 per cent. premium on their business.

Why should they be paid more? If they ever contemplated repayment by Great Britain, and, while they so contemplated it, charged premiums so huge that they could pay all their losses and have 35 per cent. over, they must have been extortioners with express malice aforethought. Paid once with splendid profits, why should they come again? Simply because incorporated man has a courage sublime enough to put the natural man to an open shame; unincorporated man is satisfied to be paid once; how many payments would satisfy incorporated man human experience has not yet decided.

It can easily be seen where that money thus saved to the fund came from. It came from war premiums. It came immediately from the insurance companies; but it came ultimately from the war-premium men. Now, why should not these men have their money back? It is their identical money which has increased the amount of the fund. Why should they not have it? It seems to me the question is too simple and clear to need discussion.

But it is sometimes said, in opposition to the proposition not to give anything to the insurance companies, "Why do you investigate the business of the insurance company and not the business of the ship-owner? Perhaps the ship-owner in the long run made money. Perhaps if he paid war premiums he added them to his freights." Such an argument shows a lack of knowledge of how business is done. What fixes the price of freight is not what it costs a man to furnish it; it is what the bulk of other people are willing to furnish it for, just as in manufactures the price is not fixed by what it costs to manufacture the article, but what the man most favorably situated can manufacture it for, if he can manufacture a sufficient quantity to supply the market.

Now, for every American bottom that was offered for freight there were offered two English bottoms that did not have to pay war premiums. Gentlemen must see at once that even at the same price the English bottom would have the advantage. Why? Because men put cargoes on ships for transportation, not to get insurance. They want the cargo to go somewhere, and they give preference to a vessel that will carry it to the destination over a vessel that might land it in the clutches of a confederate cruiser. Hence it was absolutely impossible for any American ship-owner to add the war premium on his vessel to the freight that he charged, because he was in close competition with men who had no war premium to pay.

But I hasten to a conclusion, because I promised to occupy but a very short time now, though I hope to answer hereafter any points which may be made on the other side. Let me recapitulate the leading facts. First, this was an affair between nations. This is proved by the testimony of all parties and by the decision of the tribunal itself. Second, it was an affair so combining diplomacy and damage that it cannot be settled as a pure question of damage alone. In order to distribute this money which was paid us in a lump, there must be legislation. In order that there may be legislation, we must establish the principle upon which the distribution shall take place, and the objection to referring the question to a court is simply that the court would have no principle upon which to decide it. If it should decide in favor of the insurance companies, that is a decision we do not want; if it should not decide it that way, we are capable of settling the question ourselves. We settle then the principle that this money should be paid to actual sufferers; and we say that those who suffered by the exculpated cruisers were the actual sufferers. We say that the war-premium men were the actual sufferers.

Now, let me pause here to answer one objection which occurs to me, and that is, it is said, the tribunal itself rejected the war premiums. So it did, and the tribunal was perfectly right. As between nations that was to be rejected. Why, if I pay a war premium to the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company, I lose $100, and the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company gains $100, but the country neither gains nor loses. And so far as this nation is concerned the tribunal was perfectly right in rejecting war premiums, but when we come to distribute between the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company and the war-premium men then a different principle comes into play.

It seems to me there need be no dispute about that. It seems to me it is as clear as noon-day that while the tribunal was perfectly right in rejecting that claim, nevertheless we would be perfectly wrong in rejecting it, because thereby we should do injustice to the sufferers.

Mr. Speaker, I am obliged by the attention which these facts have received, and I hope they have been presented in such fashion as to lead your judgment to what seems to me to be the only reasonable conclusion, and that is that the principles of the bill of the majority which I have stated are sound and safe for this House to follow, not in a matter of legal judgment, but in a matter of legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Speaker, in what I shall have to say on this question I shall attempt to show that the facts and principles out of which these claims arose are entirely distinct from any other class of claims ever presented for adjudication as between two nations or sovereign powers. It will be recollected almost at the beginning of this Government that during the war which commenced between England and France, in 1792, the British Government called upon this Government to frame an act preventing the fitting out of cruisers on neutral soil to prey on the commerce of nations with which that nation was on terms of peace. President Washington recommended to Congress and Congress passed what is called the foreign enlistment act, the British Government promising that on its part it would pass an act exactly the counterpart in all its provisions.

Now, the act which this Government passed at that time, and which has been since amended, I will read certain portions of to show the position this Government then took at the outset on all questions arising under the law of nations and which bind it, not only under treaty stipulations, not only under international law as defined by treaties, but under specific legislation enacted by the United States. This is what the United States adopted as a rule to be observed and binding on it in all cases. I read from section 3 of an act which was passed in 1818, being an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, passed in 1794 and amended in 1818:

That if any person shall, within the limits of the United States, fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming of any ship or vessel, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace, or shall issue or deliver a commission within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, for any ship or vessel, to the intent that she may be employed as aforesaid, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not more than $10,000, and imprisoned not more than three years. And every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with all materials, arms, ammunition, and stores, which may have been procured for the building and equipment thereof, shall be forfeited; one-half to the use of the informer, and the other half to the use of the United States.

The next section provides—

That if any citizen or citizens of the United States who shall without the limits thereof fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly aid or be concerned in furnishing, fitting out, or arming any private ship or vessel of war, or privateer, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed to cruise or commit hostilities upon the citizens of the United States or their property, or shall take the command of or enter on board of any such ship or vessel for the intent aforesaid, or who shall purchase any interest in any such ship or vessel with a view to share in the profits thereof, such person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and fined not more than $10,000 and imprisoned not more than ten years; and the trial for such offense, if committed without the limits of the United States, shall be in the district in which the offender shall be apprehended or first brought.

The next section provides—

That if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, increase or augment, or procure to be increased or augmented, or shall knowingly be concerned in increasing or augmenting, the force of any ship of war, cruiser, or other armed vessel, which, at the time of her arrival within the United States, was a ship of war, or cruiser, or armed vessel, in the service of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people, or belonging to the subjects or citizens of any such prince or state, colony, district, or people, the same being at war with any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace, by adding to the number of the guns of such vessel, or by changing those on board of her for guns of a larger caliber, or by adding thereto any equipment solely applicable to war, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not more than one thousand dollars and be imprisoned not more than one year.

The Government of Great Britain passed an act precisely like this which I have read, and which this Government enforced during the wars which Great Britain had with France, during the Napoleonic wars, during the war with Russia in 1857, and during the war with Brazil.

In one case, when the British minister called upon this Government to stop a vessel leaving the port of New York, claiming it had been fitted out and armed for a purpose prohibited by the law, the Government at once seized the vessel; but when it was determined she had not been fitted out in violation of this act, the act of neutrality, she was released, and this Government paid the damages.

Now, sir, on the breaking out of the war of the rebellion we called on the Government of Great Britain to enforce her foreign-enlistment act. We said the fitting out of confederate cruisers on her shores was an act of war. We said that our commerce could not live upon the high seas unless she enforced this act in the same way that the Government of the United States enforced its act during the various wars England had with foreign nations. During that controversy between this Government and Great Britain Sir Roundell Palmer stated in the House of Commons that it was to the honor of British law that it never proceeded on suspicion, although this Government had time after time given notice to her of the fitting out of these vessels, of their leaving her shores to prey upon our commerce, thus preventing our merchantmen from pursuing the avocation for which they were designed.

At the close of the war, after this Government had filed claims against the Government of Great Britain amounting to between twenty-two and twenty-five millions of dollars—and I will not dwell upon this point, for you all know its history—came the question between the two nations as to the liabilities for these losses. It was not a question as between a citizen or claimant against the Government, but as between two great nations as to whether the Government of Great Britain had exercised due diligence in preventing the fitting out of the confederate cruisers that left her shores to prey upon our commerce.

The Government of Great Britain claimed that in all this affair she had exercised due diligence. She claimed that she had exercised all the powers which had been conferred upon her by Parliament. On the other hand, the Government of the United States insisted that if it had not been for want of due diligence on the part of the Government of Great Britain, it would have been impossible for one of these cruisers to have left the shores of that country, manned with British sailors, and with a tender with which in some cases they put into the port of Nassau to complete the armament, and then depart upon the high seas to destroy our commerce.

You are all familiar with the case of the Pampiro, which was adjudicated in the Scottish courts, and also with regard to the Alexandria, a vessel which was condemned by Chief Baron Pollock, of the court of exchequer, and I will not therefore dwell upon that point, but come to the point of difference between the two governments, our claim being that we had suffered a great national wrong at the hands of a government with which we were at peace and on terms of amity and friendship. That was the point made by our Government, and Mr. Reverdy Johnson at the outset said, in reference to these cruisers:

They would have been in the estimation of English laws, as well as the law of nations, piratical vessels. They never, therefore, would have been on the ocean, and the vessels and cargoes belonging to American citizens destroyed by them would have been in safety. Upon this ground, then, independent of the question of proper diligence, the obligation of Great Britain to meet the losses seems to be most apparent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the first treaty which was rejected by the Senate was rejected upon the ground that no apology was sought to be offered by Great Britain for its wrong, and the Senate thought that should form a part of the negotiations. A new treaty was subsequently negotiated at Washington, in which the Government of Great Britain did offer an apology, and in which treaty I shall attempt to point out that the principle was recognized and received and the claims were settled upon an arbitration which finally took place different in its character and nature from any that had ever been arbitrated between two nations before. The treaty sets out as follows:

The United States of America and her Britannic majesty, being desirous to provide for an amicable settlement of all causes of difference between the two countries, have for that purpose appointed their plenipotentiaries, that is to say, the President of the United States has appointed on the part of the United States, as commissioners in a joint high commission and plenipotentiaries, &c.

I call your attention now to the first article of this treaty:

Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of her Britannic majesty, and still exist, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels, which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims;" and

Whereas her Britannic majesty has authorized her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries to express in a friendly spirit the regret felt by her majesty's government for the escape under whatever circumstances of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports, and for the depredations committed by those vessels;

Now, in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States—

And I call your special attention to the language and claim on the part of the United States—and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims which are not admitted by her Britannic majesty's government, the high contracting parties agree that all the said claims growing out of acts committed by the aforesaid vessels and generically known as the "Alabama claims," shall be referred to a tribunal of arbitration to be composed of five arbitrators, to be appointed in the following manner, that is to say, &c.

Now I call your attention to the three rules. In the first of these the contracting parties agree that—

In deciding the matters submitted to the arbitrators they shall be governed by the following three rules which are agreed upon by the high contracting parties as rules to be taken as applicable to the case, and by such principles of international law not inconsistent therewith as the arbitrators shall determine to have been applicable to the case.

RULES.

A neutral government is bound—

First. To use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping within its jurisdiction of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise to carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted in whole or in part within such jurisdiction to warlike use.

Secondly. Not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as a base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies, or arms, or the recruitment of men.

Thirdly. To exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

Her Brittanic majesty has commanded her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries to declare that her majesty's government cannot assent to the foregoing rules as a statement of principles of international law which were in force at the time when the claims mentioned in article 1 arose, but that her majesty's government, in order to evince its desire of strengthening the friendly relations between the two countries and of making satisfactory provision for the future, agrees that in deciding the question between the two countries arising out of those claims, the arbitrators should assume that her majesty's government had undertaken to act upon the principles set forth in these rules.

And the high contracting parties agree to observe these rules as between themselves in future, and to bring them to the knowledge of other maritime powers, and to invite them to accede to them.

I desire for a moment to call attention to this particular point: that these claims, generically known as Alabama claims, were to be disposed of and decided with all claims and damages on the part of the United States as the resulting damage done to this Government by this wrong, which had resulted to her by reason of a want of due and proper diligence on the part of the Government of Great Britain toward the United States. And I wish to state the proposition that it necessarily results that whatever sum this Government should obtain as a result of this arbitration would be a sum in damages which should be paid to the United States as a sovereign power, without reference to the question out of which those claims originated. To sustain that position I shall cite article 12 of the treaty of Washington. Article 12 provides that every claim which a citizen of this Government had against the Government of Great Britain, originating at the same period of time—I will read a small portion of the article:

The high contracting parties agree that all claims on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, citizens of the United States, upon the government of her Britannic majesty, arising out of acts committed against the persons or property of citizens of the United States during the period between the 13th of April, 1861, and the 9th of April, 1865, inclusive, not being claims growing out of the acts of the vessels referred to in article 1 of this treaty, and all claims, with the like exception, on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, subjects of her Britannic majesty, upon the Government of the United States, arising out of acts committed against the persons or property of subjects of her Britannic majesty during the same period which may have been presented to either government for its interposition with the other, and which yet remain unsettled, as well as any other such claims which may be presented within the time specified in article 14 of this treaty, shall be referred to three commissioners, to be appointed in the following manner, that is to say, one commissioner shall be named by the President of the United States, one by her Britannic majesty, &c.

It has been stated that the class of claims which have been heretofore settled between this Government and France and between this Government and the Government of Spain are in every respect similar to this class which were the subject of the arbitration at Geneva. I have not the time to refer to the particulars under which those claims were settled. Suffice it to say that in each of those cases it was provided, as in the case with Spain, that the amount paid was on account of the citizens of the United States who have preferred claims. In the case of citizens of the United States who preferred claims through this Government against France for losses incurred, it was provided the United States should distribute it among those entitled. None of these cases resemble the one under discussion.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, there can be no dispute upon this point; that the amount allowed the Government of the United States under the Geneva award was allowed for damages resulting and due her as a great sovereign power, as ascertained upon the principle of the three rules. When the money was paid to her no one, so far as any legal right is concerned, could ever call it in question. And yet what is the fact? We find here in this case that when, under the act of 1874, a large class of claims had been disposed of in regard to the class of claims known as claims arising under the exculpated cruisers, losses sustained by the action of those cruisers, as in the case of the Shenandoah before she reached Melbourne—we find it is claimed here they have no right to come in and claim one dollar of this fund; that this Government acted in the capacity of a trustee, and that when she received this fund she received it as a trustee for the claimants.

Let us look at this for a moment. It is a curious fact that the insurers, who were asking Congress to send this question to the Court of Claims to adjudicate upon the question whether they were entitled to receive the amount that they paid in losses for war premiums during the war—it is a curious fact that in order to sustain their position they are obliged to insist that this Government acted in the capacity of a trustee only in the disposition of this question. Consequently, if it can, as a legal question, be ascertained that it did not act in the capacity of a trustee, that it could not, as regarded these claims, act in the capacity of a trustee, then when they ask you to bring to bear upon the question the doctrine of subrogation the doctrine of subrogation itself must fall to the ground with the other question of trusteeship. Let us look at it for a moment. Those who advocate this view say this is a Government of trust powers; that the people created this Government in trust for their own benefit. If they did, then one individual is just as much a cestui que trust of this Government as another. And when this Government went before the Geneva tribunal and allowed one class of claims to be adjudicated by that tribunal, and allowed itself to be non-suited as to the balance, when it received a sum in gross, as a legal question the claim of one cestui que trust is as good against the trustee as another.

If the Government is a trustee to protect the rights of every individual under it, as a trustee it would have no power to divert the fund for any purpose whatever; the Geneva arbitration would have directed how it should distribute the fund. And because they did not the minority report say you should send it to the Court of Claims; that the Court of Claims, according to equity and the law of nations, and under the treaty and award, may dispose of those claims and distribute the fund. And if you get them there what will they say? Will they not say, "You, the Congress of the United States, send this amount to us and tell us to take into account the question of the position of these claimants under the award and distribute this fund under the treaty, the award and the act giving us jurisdiction." At the outset the arbitrators stated to the Government of the United States the claim it made for indirect damages was a claim it could not sustain, because it was entirely speculative. That was right. This Government never expected to get anything for indirect damages, but she put in her claim because she wanted not only Great Britain should apologize to this Government for the great wrong done but she wanted the question settled for the future, and, as much for her benefit as for the benefit of any other nation, to have it determined whether indirect damages could in any case be recovered as between two nations.

Then came up the question of fitting out our war vessels for the purpose of intercepting these confederate cruisers. Great Britain said that that claim must be rejected, for the reason that this Government was on a war footing and had to fit out these war vessels, and the damage was not one for which we could recover.

But the Geneva arbitrators said that as to the balance of these claims, where the damage was actual, or where the damage was proximate, they would consider the claims. When they decided to reject the other claims, this Government gave notice to its counsel at Geneva to apprise the arbitrators of the fact that we should insist that the award, whatever amount it might be, should be made to us in gross; because, mind you, it made but little difference to this Government whether as a sovereign government it received one dollar or none.

The question at issue was whether Great Britain had committed any wrong; whether there had been a want of due diligence exercised by her; whether we were right in assuming the position we had taken, or whether we were wrong. That was the great question at issue between the two nations; that was the question to be settled, a question of far greater value than any number of millions of dollars that the British Government could be mulcted in as damages to pay this Government.

The result was this: when the Geneva arbitrators made their award they gave us a gross sum of fifteen and a half millions of dollars. Now, the underwriters say to us—and I will say at the outset that I have no bias unless it be a legal bias against them; I want to see right and justice done in this matter. If there is enough to pay them, then this Government can do as it pleases. I shall never object to paying them upon any principle that will permit them to come here and claim it as a matter of mere grace. But I hold that every individual must claim as a matter of grace anything which the Government may conclude to pay him out of this award.

No sovereign government, standing in the position we occupy in regard to this fund, can occupy any other legal position. If the Government is liable as a trustee of this fund, then there must be under the law and the Constitution some remedy by which an individual who is entitled to the protection of this Government, it being a trustee for him, can compel the Government as a matter of morals and of equity to pay him, and to pay him as a matter of right and not as a matter of grace.

Now, the underwriters say to us that when they paid the total loss of any vessel destroyed by the confederate cruisers they became subrogated to the rights of the owners of the cargo and vessel. Now, what is the doctrine of subrogation? It is this: when a total loss ensues, and there is an abandonment to the underwriters, they take the specific thing for whatever it is worth. Who committed this wrong? The English Government. Who destroyed the property? The confederate cruisers destroyed it. Then what does the underwriter get under the doctrine of subrogation? He gets the right only to proceed against that confederate cruiser who destroyed the property in order to get back the amount that he paid.

The doctrine of subrogation cannot apply against England. The man who lost the vessel never had any right against the English Government. His property was destroyed by confederate cruisers. The act they committed was a legal act, in that it was an act for carrying on war. Therefore no man ever paid a war premium and no underwriter ever issued one war risk upon the idea that they could be subrogated. I say it is a natural consequence that all they became subrogated to was the right to pursue the engine, or the force, or the power that destroyed the property, or those who directed it. How is it in all the decisions involving the doctrine of subrogation? In case of willful or of gross negligence on the part of one vessel by which another vessel is destroyed the right of action against the vessel, if the owners of the destroyed vessel abandon it and the underwriters pay the loss, goes to the underwriters, who become subrogated, and if an action is brought in the name of the owners of the vessel whatever amount may be recovered is recovered in trust for the underwriters. Why is that? Because the damage caused by such negligence on the part of the master of that vessel was the proximate and direct result of the wrong complained of.

In the case of the confederate cruisers the direct act which destroyed the vessel insured was the act of the confederate cruisers themselves. They were insured against the acts of the confederate cruisers. They were not insured against any act of Great Britain. They were not insured against the act of any foreign government. They were insured against the act of these confederate vessels; it was only in respect of the cruisers that war risks were insured; and when a confederate vessel destroyed one of these merchantmen, and there was a total loss and abandonment under a war-risk policy, the indemnities could only be subrogated to the remnants of the thing for salvage, &c., including whatever could be legally recovered against the party who destroyed the property.

I say there is no other principle known to the law. The principle which arose between us and Great Britain was new in its character, one which never was applied before. In the progress of our civilization upon this continent and in Great Britain there were instituted certain rules to be observed, and in the carrying out of those rules in good faith Great Britain called upon us to observe them, and we observed them through all her various wars.

Then we said to Great Britain that when she refused to observe them she committed a wrong which under her foreign-enlistment act she had power as a government to prevent, and she refused to prevent it; that due diligence would have prevented it. Then we as a sovereign Government, as a sovereign power, as a great nation, went to Great Britain as a great nation and insisted upon her paying us damages for this wrong. The damages which we received are what are generically known as the Alabama claims. They are of just as different character from those provided for in article 12 of the treaty as they are different from the claims paid under the Spanish and the French conventions.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that a wide distinction is to be taken between this class of claims and the class of claims which are ordinarily settled between governments on account of individuals. The treaty in this case plainly recognized the difference when it provided in article 1 for the class of claims called generically "Alabama claims," which were to be disposed of by arbitrators at Geneva, and in article 12 provided for claims which arose during precisely the same period for damages that should be paid on account of private individuals or citizens of the United States.

By those who claim that the underwriters should receive this money it has been urged not only that the Parliament of Great Britain did the best it could under the circumstances but that because the Geneva arbitrators decided that the Shenandoah before she reached Melbourne was not an inculpated cruiser, the claims of persons whose vessels were destroyed by the Shenandoah before she reached Melbourne should be thrown out by this Government and we should not pay such persons a dollar. Look at the case of one vessel which the Shenandoah destroyed the day before she reached Melbourne. On that occasion she had the English flag flying at her mast until the moment of making the attack, when she hauled down the English flag and raised the confederate flag.

When it is argued that the underwriters are entitled to be subrogated to the rights of those who paid the war premiums which they were required to pay during the war, I call attention to the fact that during the war 1,020 American merchantmen changed from an American to an English registry, because it became a question whether it was worse to be destroyed by confederate cruisers or by the underwriters who were demanding their exorbitant war rates. What did these American merchantmen do? They undertook to escape the cruisers and the insurance men by changing their registry and sailing under the British flag. I call attention to this fact to show that as a matter of law the principle which is to be applied to this class of cases is different from any that has ever been decided in any court of justice in this country or can arise. The principle we here contend for is recognized in cases which have been decided in England, and is fully sustained. I call attention to the case which has been so often spoken of, the case of Rustomjee. I will read a statement of the facts as embodied in the report of the majority of the court:

By treaty between the Queen and the Emperor of China, $3,000,000 were paid to the Queen by the Emperor on account of debts due to British subjects from Chinese merchants who had become insolvent. The petitioner, Rustomjee, was owner of one of the debts covered by that payment; and during the negotiations the British agents promised him that his claim should be pressed and that the money when recovered should be paid him. It was not disputed that this very debt was included in the sum so paid. Under the laws of England whoever claims that the Queen has money of his in her possession may bring suit therefor by petition of right. Rustomjee filed such a petition, claiming the Queen to be his agent and trustee. In commenting upon this claim Chief-Justice Cockburn, himself one of the Geneva tribunal, uses language the application and pertinency of every word of which to the present case is too plain to need comment:

"In such a case a petition of right will not lie."

Then if the petition of right would not lie the Government could not have been a trustee, for by the common law of England, where the Crown or the government is a trustee the petition of right does lie.

In such a case a petition of right will not lie. The notion that the Queen of this country, in receiving a sum of money in order to do justice to some of her subjects, to whom otherwise injustice would be done, becomes the agent of those subjects, seems to me really too wild a notion to require a single word of observation beyond that of emphatically condemning it. In like manner, to say that the sovereign becomes the "trustee" for subjects on whose behalf money has been received by the Crown appears to be equally untenable. It comes simply to this, that her majesty, in order to enable her to see that injustice is not done to her subjects, stipulates for the payment in her hands of a sum of money. The distribution of that must be left to her majesty's discretion.

Lord Coleridge, in commenting upon this case, said:

We assent, upon full consideration, to the reasoning of the judges in the court below. The making of peace and the making of war, as they are the undoubted, so they are, perhaps, the highest acts of the prerogative of the Crown. The terms on which peace is made are in the absolute discretion of the sovereign.

I call attention to this point to show that these Alabama claims involve a different question from any ever presented on the part of this Government to any other nation. They arose out of a controversy which, if not settled, might have led these two great nations to the trial by battle to determine which was right and which was wrong. This Government could not yield her national honor; and unless both parties would provide by treaty for submitting the question to arbitration, armed hostilities might have ensued. The case was the same in principle as if this money had been paid upon the conclusion of peace at the termination of a war—as if it had been paid as pure indemnity to this Government for the wrong done to her national honor.

But it is said that this principle, although undoubtedly English law, is not applicable to this country, because the Government of the United States was created by the people as a trustee for their benefit. I desire to say, with all due respect, that the principle upon which this Government is founded is precisely the same as that on which the Government of Great Britain rests. We have a written constitution. England has a constitution which is contained in Magna Charta, in the decisions of her courts, and in her statutes. But although the facts and documents upon which the British constitution rests extend from the era of Runnymede to the present day, England has no less a written constitution than we have.

In every case where this Government stands in the position of a trustee, I say there is no power to prevent the Constitution having its full effect, namely, to protect every citizen in every right he possesses. If, then, it is a trustee as a cestui que trust of this Government, every man has the legal right to demand he shall be paid every dollar due him.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have a later case than that of the Rustomjee. We have a case decided in the court of last resort of Great Britain. The facts are as follows: the owner of a vessel who suffered a loss during our war, and who was paid under the act of 1874, was sued by the underwriters in Great Britain to recover the sum paid him. Now let us see what the court said in that case:

Plaintiffs, underwriters in England, underwrote a valued policy, including war risks, on cargo belonging to defendants, shipped on board a United States vessel. The real value of the cargo was more than the amount named in the policy. The cargo was destroyed by the confederate cruiser Alabama, and plaintiffs paid the amount named in the policy to defendants as an actual total loss; but in pursuance of defendant's claim under this act they recovered the difference between the actual loss and the amount insured. The decision of Lord Chief-Justice Coleridge was reversed. I will take the time to refer to some parts of that decision. He goes on and gives the terms of the act of 1874, to which I have already called attention. He then says:

Two things are clear from the facts as applied to this section:

(1.) That the defendants got their money from the court on the proof, or allegation at least, that their actual loss in respect of the cargo of the Lamplighter exceeded the compensation or indemnity paid them by the plaintiffs under the policy; and

(2.) That the money could not have been obtained from the court either by the plaintiffs suing in their own name or by the defendants suing on the plaintiffs' behalf; and the question is, now that the defendants have obtained the money under these circumstances, can the plaintiffs recover it from them? In other words, have the defendants obtained the money under circumstances which make them in respect of it trustees for the plaintiffs? Two points arise: 1. Is the value in the policy which has been paid absolutely conclusive in case of actual total loss between the parties to the policy? 2. Was the payment of their money to the defendant more than a free gift, a pure act of grace on the part of the United States? As to the first question, there has been an actual total loss, a positive, complete destruction of the thing insured; and I think that in this case the valuation in the policy is conclusive between the parties. They have by agreement settled the value and not left it open to future inquiry and dispute as between themselves.—Shawe vs. Felton, 2 East, 109; per Lord Abinger, delivering judgment in Young vs. ——

He then goes on:

If it were, I am of opinion that this action would clearly be not maintainable, and at first sight there is much to be said for the contention that it is a mere act of grace. The money out of which this is paid to the defendant is a sum of money paid by Great Britain to the United States, from one sovereign state to another; and Rustomjee vs. The Queen, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S., 278; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S., 190; 1 Q. B. Div., 487; 2 Q. B. Div., 69, is a distinct authority for holding that money being paid by one sovereign state to another, in respect of war losses occasioned by the paying state to the subjects of the receiving state, gives no legal right whatever to a particular subject of the receiving state, compensation for whose loss has been paid to that state, capable of being enforced in any court against the sovereign or the government of that state.

He decides that it was not an act of grace, not a mere gift. He then adds:

It is therefore no doubt clear that the defendants could have had no legal claim capable of being enforced against the United States in their sovereign character. But it seems to be equally clear, as the result of great authorities both in England and in America, that if a country puts a fund of this sort in course of distribution by regular process among such of its subjects as are morally entitled to share in the fund, then what their subjects so recover they recover as a right, not, perhaps, enforceable by law, but yet with such a character of moral equity about it as makes them, in respect of what they so recover, trustees for those who in equity and justice are entitled to it. This appears to me to have been held in principle by Lord Northington, Lord Hardwicke, and Chancellor Kent when chief-justice of New York.

On appeal the House of Lords reversed the decision of Chief-Justice Coleridge, giving judgment for plaintiff. Here is what Justice Bramwell said:

I cannot (though I say so with the greatest respect) think that the judgment of Lord Coleridge is right; and, although the court is not unanimous, it seems to me that it would be useless to take time to consider our judgment, for what we have to decide is a short point, and there is no complication in the case. Lord Coleridge thought that there were only two points which it was necessary to consider, for he said in the course of his judgment: "Two points arise: first, is the value in the policies which have been paid absolutely conclusive in case of actual loss between the parties to the policies? and secondly, was the payment of this money to the defendants more than a free gift, a pure act of grace on the part of the United States?" Now, I venture to think that there is a third, and a most important point, which is this: suppose this was a free gift, was it a gift which could be called a portion of the salvage of the thing insured?

I agree with the reasoning and the conclusion of Lord Coleridge on the other points; and agreeing with his reasoning, I should have thought that if the money had been awarded because the cargo was taken by the Alabama simpliciter it would have been a portion of the salvage, and the present case would have been within the principle of the cases referred to and relied upon in his judgment. But there arises the third question, which was omitted in Lord Coleridge's judgment, namely, Was this given as salvage? I am clearly of opinion that it was not. In considering this question we must look at the act of Congress. It says that no claim shall be allowed for any loss in respect of which compensation or indemnity has been received from insurers, but that if an owner insures by a valued policy for an amount which is under the real value of the property insured he shall receive nothing for the policy, but for the underinsurance he shall receive an indemnity.

In reversing Lord Coleridge's opinion Justice Brett used the following language:

If we had not had plenty of time to consider the point I should think it right to reserve judgment, as the court is not unanimous. This money was in the first place recovered by the American Government from England by treaty. The United States Government did not bind itself in any way as to the disposal of the money, and there was no obligation on it to give any of that money to the present defendants. Therefore there was a sum of money in the hands of the Government and there was no obligation binding the Government as to its disposal. The Government was at liberty to make a gift of it to any person, but was not bound to do so. If it had been paid over as a portion of the salvage it may be that the mere fact that there was no obligation on the part of the Government would not prevent the money from being payable to the underwriters. That may be the effect of the cases before Lord Hardwicke and Lord Northington, (Randal vs. Cockran and Blaaunpot vs. Da Costa.) but I doubt if that is the principle of those decisions. I should think the principle must be that the Government had recovered the money for the assured; but if that were so the money could not be recovered from the Government. If these decisions proceeded on the supposition that the money was a pure gift on the part of the Government, and was handed over to the assured as such, I could not follow the reasoning; and unless we are bound by the decisions I should say that we ought not to follow them. If the money was paid over in the present case as part of the salvage of the property insured these cases might be authorities in favor of the contention on behalf of the plaintiffs.

In my opinion, however, the true principle is that the United States Government did not pay this money as salvage; that it was paid not for the loss of the goods, but as a gift, because the owners of the goods were not insured to the full value of what they had lost. The Government would have paid the owners of the goods if they had not been insured at all, or if they had entered into a policy but could not recover from the underwriters. The payment was not in respect of the loss, but because the owners were not fully insured. The present case is quite different from the English cases to which I have already referred, because here the money could only be recovered in America before one court. If the present defendants had sued in that court, stating that they were suing for the underwriters, or if the underwriters had sued in their own names, not one penny could have been recovered. In the English cases, if the assured had declared that he was suing as a trustee for the underwriters, or if the underwriter were suing in his own name, the person so suing would recover all the money; but then the Government would pay as matter of salvage. Here the assured could not recover on behalf of the underwriters. I am of opinion that the act of Congress makes it a free gift, whatever money is paid, because the owners are under-insured, and therefore that this is distinguishable from the English cases, and the judgment ought to be reversed.

It was decided by a majority of the court that it was a mere act of grace on the part of the United States in passing the act of 1874 and paying that money. Those were claims directly adjudicated, and which all admitted were claims allowed under the Geneva award. Consequently this decision establishes the principle that it makes no difference whether the claim allowed was one which the Geneva tribunal recognized, whether of an inculpated or exculpated cruiser that the money paid by this Government was paid by a mere act of grace.

It is assumed as a principle that when the people endow a government with the attributes of sovereignty, that they create a sovereignty which can suffer a wrong they cannot in their individual capacity suffer, and having thus endowed that government with a sovereignty of that character, when it comes as one of the great nations of the earth before a tribunal in connection with another government, and submits what it claims to be wrongs against its national honor, and that tribunal passes on the question and gives a sum in gross as damages, it makes no difference what are the items out of which that claim arose.

When it received it it received it in its sovereign capacity and received it to deal with as it saw fit, just as it saw proper, because it could go before that tribunal and submit that great wrong and have the question decided without submitting one dollar or one cent of claims to be recovered in the shape of damages in dollars and cents. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that when we consider the question in its proper light, and when we find that no underwriter has any standing anywhere in any case to claim one cent of this money, except upon the basis that this Government is a trustee, and when it is clear that this Government could not be a trustee in respect to this fund in any sense whatever, it must follow conclusively that the Government can dispose of it and, what is more, that it should never send it to any tribunal to parcel it out and dispose of it in a manner contrary to what is proper and right when all of the facts are considered.

The people of this country, or this country itself in its national character, has created this Congress a tribunal for the adjudication of just such cases, have endowed it with the power to decide just such questions, and it is clearly within the province of Congress to deal with this fund as it may see fit. Congress, we are told, cannot deal with it properly; that Congress has not the paraphernalia of a court for taking testimony, for hearing evidence and disposing of cases; that we should take it out of the pale of Congress and send it to the Court of Claims and let that court dispose of the questions arising out of these claims. You endow that court with power to decide all these questions. You say to the court decide and pass upon the questions, and under the treaty and the award dispose of the claims by the principles of law and equity according as you may see fit, the only limitation being that the court should observe equity, the law of nations, the treaty, and the award.

Now, Congress can do all this, and it can provide a commission and direct it what rules to observe in the disposition of the fund without any risk of having every sense of justice shocked by the fund being parceled out to the underwriters, and those who suffered actual loss by loss of property or by paying war premiums not receiving anything therefor.

Again, send this question to the Court of Claims under the minority bill, and you surely give the underwriters a legal standing in that court; and, having gained that, they can then with reason contend that they are entitled to the relief they ask and that Congress had so decided, at least tacitly, by passing the act which enabled them to stand before that tribunal.

If you raise the commission provided in the bill of the majority you simply pay, in the first instance, those who suffered actual loss by the exculpated cruisers the actual amount thereof, and those who paid war premiums and were compelled to do so by reason of want of due diligence on the part of England, and who paid it for the privilege of sailing under the Stars and Stripes, so that both of these classes of sufferers became sufferers simply because they were sailing under the American flag. The underwriters who embarked in the venture of war risks and lost in that venture were paid their losses under the act of 1874. Those who not only did not lose but made a handsome fortune of the venture are now asking us to reimburse them to a certain degree the losses they did pay.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the decision which was made last year by the House of Lords determines conclusively that not in respect to one dollar of the Geneva award is this Government a trustee, whether claims for loss sustained by the acts of inculpated cruisers or by loss through the exculpated cruisers. But we are called to consider the decisions which have been made by courts of last resort in the United States, and the cases as decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, which, it is claimed, sustain the principle that under the doctrine of subrogation the parties can come in and claim that as we have received the money they are entitled to it; and not a dollar should go to those who have suffered actual loss, the persons who had the misfortune not to have insured their property and received their policies at the hands of these very underwriters.

Now, I undertake to say that all the decisions referred to belong to a class well recognized, to wit, where the insured in case of loss and abandonment receives of the underwriters the amount insured and afterward receives salvage or any other benefit that arises out of the property so abandoned, holds it as trustee for the underwriters, and they can receive it, or if the insured does not receive it the underwriters become entitled to receive all such benefits flowing from the property so abandoned; and it would also follow, if the property was destroyed by the willful or negligent act of another so that a right of action for damages would lie in behalf of the insured the underwriter would succeed to that right.

The question here is entirely different. In these cases now under consideration the destruction of the property was the act of the confederate cruisers, just what the underwriters insured against. The fund in question was received by this Government as an indemnity from Great Britain for a wrong done by that government to this Government in not exercising proper diligence in preventing the fitting out and arming confederate cruisers.

Now, as I said at the outset, I am not biased against the underwriters, so far as that is concerned. The Government has the money, and I am willing that it shall be paid out as Congress may see fit, from time to time, to pay it. But I am not willing that when there are many knocking at the Halls of Congress, who have suffered loss and injury and who have never received a dollar for it, who have lost their all, which they had invested under the American flag to go upon the high seas to encourage and promote the commerce of this Government, I say I am not willing, because they did not have the fortune to change their registry and did not insure with these underwriters, that they shall go away unheard and unheeded, and tell them we will send the adjudication of this question to the Court of Claims. This would enable the persons who have amassed fortunes from war premiums to be paid to the exclusion of those who really lost their property by the acts of these confederate cruisers.

Is it right or just when they suffered injury because of the acts of these confederate cruisers, against which they had no insurance, that they should be thrown out of any tribunal which can afford them relief, and in case of actual loss suffered by them have no remedy? Such a principle would be wrong, and in violation of every spirit of right which has been maintained in any civilized government on earth. Many cases of loss occurred where no insurance at all was taken and no policies were held by the losers, and yet the action proposed by the minority report would give the benefit of this arbitration fund to the insurance companies rather than to the actual losers. Did the underwriters insure against the wrongful acts of any government on earth? Did they insure against the acts of Great Britain? They simply insured against the risk of capture by confederate cruisers.

Now, what was the great wrong in this matter? We said to England in the outset: "We have no objections to your selling to confederates arms, powder, and guns; we have no objections to your making, building, and delivering to them in the confederate ports your war vessels; but what we complain of is this: you are perpetrating a great wrong on this Government by allowing and aiding the confederates to fit out these vessels in your ports and leave your shores. That is an act of war," we said. In the case of a war vessel fitted out in New York when England was at war with Brazil the English Government complained of us. We said, "Our ship-builders sold that vessel to the Brazilian Government under contract to deliver it at the port of Bahia, a port of the power at war. It was contraband in its passage; if you attacked and destroyed it in its transit, that would be lawful. And all we ask now is to enforce the same rule we were willing to enforce against ourselves. If you want to sell your guns and materials that are contraband of war; if you want to sell your vessels to confederates, you may do so, but you must deliver them in their own ports, so that you shall not interfere with the principles of neutrality. But you have perpetrated a great wrong against this nation, what is really an act of war, just as much an act of war on the part of Great Britain as though these vessels sailed continually under the British flag." And, as I have stated, in one instance they did sail under the British flag until the attack was made, and when the attack was made they hoisted the confederate flag.

I ask it to be considered, when under the twelfth article we have comprised all the claims which have been allowed us on account of private individuals under the treaty of Washington, and when under the first article we have included all claims generically known as the Alabama claims, when the one class were to be disposed of by a commission and the other class were to be paid by a sum in gross as an indemnity to this Government under the arbitration at Geneva, if they were not damages received by us resulting from a great national wrong on the part of the British Government and not in any sense as damages received on account of any private individual? It seems to me that this point cannot be questioned; and if so, this Government can never in any sense be called a trustee in respect to one dollar of this sum. For it has been decided in reference to these claims which have been admitted and disposed of under the twelfth article of this treaty on account of private individuals that there is a resulting trust raised by implication by the very act of article 12; because there we agree with Great Britain that this commission shall allow our citizens on their private account, if the amount is allowed, that it shall be allowed them as private individuals.

Therefore, I say a trust results to them on the part of this Government, and those claims have all been paid; whereas the Alabama claims were not regarded as claims of private individuals, but they were regarded as damages which we had suffered, and which we from time to time during the war, through our minister at the Court of St. James, presented, and caused the secretary of foreign affairs of Great Britain to receive and file as a claim which the Government of the United States made against the Government of Great Britain in her sovereign capacity, and not as claims which she made on account of private citizens or individuals.

Now, what is the position which the underwriters have to take in order to sustain the point which they make and which they insist upon? That if you send this matter to the Court of Claims you thereby rid yourselves of all this difficulty. This would be an easy way for this Congress to shirk the responsibility, and give it to a tribunal, a quasi-tribunal, to dispose of a question which we should always retain under our own control. This Congress should never lose control of this fund or of one dollar of it. It is morally bound to pay it to those who actually suffered wrong.

And here is another point the underwriters make. The underwriters say this:

> There are many people not conversant with the business of marine insurance who believe that the rates of premium are placed at such price which will pay a profit to the underwriter after proper estimates are made for total and partial losses, expenses, &c. But as the underwriter is apt to recover salvage from property stranded or such which may be entirely submerged, for which he has paid a total loss, the rates of premium in view of such recovery are placed correspondingly lower. And by the same basis of calculation were the war premiums fixed and determined, the underwriters on this branch of their business also calculating on a recovery of salvage, in this case from Great Britain, and in which calculation, as events have proved, they were correct, as the United States Government has recovered such salvage for them at Geneva, and now holds same in trust.

I read to you but a short time since the decision of the court of last resort in England, in which they distinctly decide it could not be recovered as salvage. It is true they decide this in giving construction to the act of Congress of 1874. Yet if this Government received the salvage of Great Britain and now holds it as trustee, as the underwriters claim, the act of 1874 nor could any other act of Congress destroy a trust once created as a valid trust. And again, the decision informs us that this is an indemnity fund received by us entirely unaffected by anything determined at Geneva, so far as the disposition of it is concerned, that in respect to that this Government is alone the sole judge.

And yet these underwriters, as an afterthought, tell us that they were providing for this very thing; that whatever was recovered from Great Britain was recovered in respect of salvage; that they made a calculation and made the premiums correspondingly low. They say that events have proved that they were correct, as the United States Government had recovered such salvage for them at Geneva, and now holds the same in trust for them.

In all the arguments that have been made in favor of the underwriters in either House of Congress, in the committee-room, or anywhere else, they proceed upon the distinct idea that this Government is the trustee of this fund. If it is proven that the Government is not a trustee, then their case falls; they have no standing anywhere unless this Government is the trustee of this fund.

It has been decided by two different decisions of the court of last resort in Great Britain, in respect to this very fund, that this Government was not a trustee of this fund. Consequently, it seems to me incontrovertible that this amount was received by us from Great Britain for damages resulting not from any wrong the confederates have done us, because their acts were legal. It is true they destroyed our property, but they destroyed it legally and as an act of war. But the point we make is that England committed a wrong in not exercising due diligence in preventing these confederate cruisers from leaving her ports for that purpose. Our claim was a national one, not a private one. Not a dollar of the award we obtained was of a private character; every dollar of it was of a public character.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I would like a few minutes more.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the gentleman finish his remarks to-morrow.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Oh, no; let him have time now.

Mr. KING. I ask consent that the time of the gentleman be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It seems to me that the bill of the majority of the committee, which provides for the raising of a commission and keeping this money under the control of Congress, is in pursuance of right and justice, and recognizes the fact that this Congress is fully competent to dispose of this question. This Congress is the great national tribunal that should keep control of this fund. We should not shirk the responsibility and send this matter to the Court of Claims.

If there is one dollar of this money which we should pay to any one, let us pay it to those who are entitled to it, to those who have suffered loss. If after you have done that you desire to pay these underwriters, then Congress can do it. But if you now make the mistake of sending this matter to the Court of Claims, and clothe that court with the legal power which the act will give them, it will give these underwriters a legal right which they do not now possess and do not claim. You will thereby have done a wrong to the mercantile marine of this country, a wrong which is much greater than any benefit which the underwriters seek to obtain by endeavoring to get you to pursue the course they urge upon you.

They say if you give it to them you will encourage a system of protection under war risks to vessels on the high seas. That is nothing but a flimsy pretense. I have shown you that 1,020 American vessels changed their registry to a British registry. It was simply a question with the man who owned a vessel whether he would be swamped under these war risks which the underwriters imposed upon him, or whether he would run the risk of being taken and sunk by these confederate cruisers. That was the only alternative he had left. Many of the owners of vessels, in order to escape the underwriters, preferred to run the risk of being destroyed by confederate cruisers.

Those men who preferred to run that risk now come here and ask Congress to raise a commission and let them go before it and put in their proof. If their vessels and cargoes were destroyed by these confederate cruisers, and they have received nothing for them, then this Government which has this fund, which received it as the result of a great national wrong to itself, as an act of indemnity to itself, should take these claims into consideration; for these claims are for damages resulting from the wrongful act of Great Britian as fully as any of the claims paid under the act of 1874.

The Geneva tribunal, in disposing of this case, did not say to our counsel and to our Government that these indirect damages and damages sustained by fitting out a navy to prevent the confederate cruisers from destroying our commerce were damages which should not be allowed, because they were damages resulting to this Government. They rejected them on a well-known principle that there can be no rule by which speculative damages can be computed.

They did not say that these claims known generically as Alabama claims, being losses sustained by our merchantmen, were not national claims; they did not pretend they were private claims. They said that these claims were all of the same character, all arose out of the same transaction; that all belong in the same category, and the treaty of Washington admitted this. But they allowed one part of the claims and rejected the others, and they gave us a sum in gross.

In conclusion I desire to say that if Congress shall adopt the report of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary and send these matters to the Court of Claims, it will shirk a great responsibility, and will give to that court a power which it should never give to any tribunal. This Congress is essentially the tribunal in which all these claims should be disposed of, so that we can control the funds of the Government. It is simply a mere act of grace on our part; but we should act justly and pay all those who are justly entitled to be paid. We should reject the claims of those who have suffered no losses and pay the claims of those who have suffered losses, and therefore show the people of this country that we will protect them as the wards of the Government equally with the class of claimants who are strong, who lift up their heads before us here, demanding that the other claimants have no rights because they come under the head of exculpated cruisers, while they themselves come under the head of inculpated cruisers.

The question which the Geneva tribunal disposed of was a question of international law. The law as determined by them we are bound by. They awarded us a sum of money as one of the results of that determination, as the damage the United States Government claimed of the British Government. The arbitrators had no power to indicate, nor did they attempt to indicate, the manner in which this Government should dispose of it. Then let this Government maintain its prerogative as well as its dignity and deal justly with these claimants.

Mr. GROUT obtained the floor.

Mr. CONVERSE. If the gentleman will yield, I will move that the House adjourn. He can proceed with his remarks in the morning.

Mr. GROUT. I will yield, retaining the right to the floor.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Lewis Atkinson be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BECK. I offer the following resolution:

Whereas all branches of business connected with the production and consumption of distilled spirits are depressed and embarrassed by the uncertainty which prevails relative to the action of Congress on the subject: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate will consider and take action on House bill No. 5656, extending the bonded period on distilled spirits, as soon as practicable after the Finance Committee is able to report it.

Mr. President, I desire only to say in regard to the resolution that as the court of appeals bill perhaps will be finished to-day, before any other important measure is called up, to-morrow at two o'clock, unless there is something more urgent then pending, I shall ask the Senate to listen to me for about thirty minutes while I explain the provisions of the bill to which the resolution relates. If I cannot do so at that time I shall ask to be heard on Monday. I do not desire to make any long statement on the subject, but I hope to say something that will interest the Senate in regard to the true condition of the bill and the importance of action upon it. I ask that the resolution lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the resolution read.

The Acting Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say to the Senator that I have no disposition to hurry the committee at all in merely making a report or writing out anything in regard to it, but I thought perhaps to-morrow or some other time when I had an opportunity I would give my views on the bill, and perhaps the Senator from Ohio himself would like to say something upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection at all that the resolution lie over as the basis of remarks to be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. BECK. That is all I desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORGAN. If there is no further routine morning business, in pursuance of the notice I gave yesterday I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1052) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him before proceeding regularly with the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

Mr. INGALLS. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the condition of the public business and to the inadvisability of continuing longer to proceed as we have done for the last month, since the amendment of the Anthony rule. That rule was designed to secure a brief interval between the expiration of morning business proper and two o'clock, during which cases upon the Calendar to which there was no objection might be considered for the purpose of facilitating public business.

Prior to the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and advocated with so much zeal by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] as indispensable to free speech and the preservation of constitutional liberty and civil government, we had transacted more business than at any other previous session during my experience in this body. The adoption of that amendment was the opening of Pandora's box, in a parliamentary sense, and since that time the interval between the expiration of formal morning business and two o'clock has been spent in diffusive, discursive, unsatisfactory, and unproductive debate, with almost an absolute cessation of business.

We considered for an indefinite period the political disabilities question arising on the bill for the relief of Dr. Tebbs. Nothing was done with that. For the past week we have been considering the case of L. Madison Day under the five-minute rule. Nothing has been done with that; and now the Senator from Alabama desires to continue this anarchy and chaos by taking up, while all these other matters have been discussed and not disposed of, the Japanese indemnity bill, which will result in the exclusion, for an indefinite period, perhaps, of the consideration of cases that require deliberation and that might be considered without difficulty and without delay.

I make these remarks for the purpose of saying that it appears to me we have had sufficient experience, both in regard to the value of the Anthony rule and the absolute inefficiency of the methods we have been pursuing for the last three weeks, to return to the good old methods when cases were called up and under the five-minute rule considered or sent over under objection. I ask, therefore, instead of calling such cases up at this time, that we may proceed to the consideration of cases on the Calendar under the Anthony rule, to the end that something may be done during the session that is so rapidly drawing to a close. It seems to me that, in view of the experience we have had in these inconclusive debates, there can be no doubt that the public interests will be best subserved by considering those cases on the Calendar to which there is no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. The modification which was made of the Anthony rule was by the almost unanimous consent of the Senate. It was that the Senate might take up by a vote, notwithstanding an objection which would postpone, a case which had been called up under the Anthony rule, and proceed with it without limitation of debate within the morning hour or until two o'clock. The difficulty in proceeding under that amendment has simply been that the Senate has been indulgent to gentlemen who desired to discuss a measure ad libitum. The discussion on the military bill, whatever that was, and the discussion of the L. Madison Day case has gone on by unanimous consent. The Senator from Kansas had the right to object to the L. Madison Day case at any time.

Mr. INGALLS. No, the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. MORGAN. I think I am not.

Mr. INGALLS. On the L. Madison Day case it could have been done, but so far as the political disabilities bill was concerned, that was taken up by a vote, and debate was unlimited under the rule.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all right. The Senate ought to have the right to take up a case that demands attention and debate it as long as is necessary for a proper understanding of it. The debate on the L. Madison Day case could have been obstructed and the rule of five minutes' debate could have been applied at any time that the Senator from Kansas saw proper to ask for it.

Mr. INGALLS. Then any Senator could have moved to take it up, and a majority would have had control of it.

Mr. MORGAN. And if the majority did take control of it, the Senator from Kansas had no right to complain.

Mr. INGALLS. No, of course, I do not complain, but I address myself to the reason of every Senator on each side of the Chamber and ask a reply, whether in view of our experience it is not best for all interests involved to spend the brief interval between the expiration of the formal morning business and two o'clock in the consideration of measures which are confessedly important, and to which there is no objection?

Mr. MORGAN. The measure which I have had the honor frequently to bring to the attention of the Senate seems to have the approbation of a very large majority of this body as it had the approbation of almost the entire House of Representatives when that body passed the bill. It has been now recommended in twelve reports, all favorable, in the different branches of Congress and through many years. I was instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to try to bring the measure forward. I have made several ineffectual attempts, the reason being that Senators seem to have more interest in those cases which concern their constituents or their States than they have in a case which makes an appeal to nothing but to the honor of the country. If the Senate desires to take that view of the question I have no right to complain at it; but it has occurred to me that the Committee on Foreign Relations at least has a right to be heard upon the floor of the Senate.

This cause was called on the Calendar and passed without prejudice. I again ventured to go back to it and asked the Senate to consider it under the Anthony rule, and relied upon the indulgence of the Senate that they would allow some little time to those gentlemen who desired to debate the bill. I frequently said that so far as I was concerned I cared nothing about debating the question except to answer such questions or arguments as might be urged against the measure. The bill still stands in that attitude; it is still on the Calendar and subject to call under the Anthony rule, because it has been passed over twice now without prejudice. Yesterday I gave notice that I would call it up this morning to take effect before the Anthony rule began to operate, because I believed conscientiously that the case could be disposed of this morning and be gotten out of the way.

As to the course of business in the Senate, the Senator from Kansas correctly said that more business had been transacted at this session of the Senate than at any previous one, at least within my experience. My observation concurs with his on that point; but it must be remembered that we are yet very far ahead of the House in our action. Bill after bill that we have sent to the House of Representatives has never been reported from their committees and has never been considered. Only a few of the most important leading measures of this Congress have as yet received consideration in the House. We take up bills and pass them here for pensions whenever they are called without any objection; we do everything that every person requests, it seems to me, except to attend to this bill which has been reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I think the Senator from Kansas ought to come up and meet this question fair and square, and not attempt by objections to postpone it from time to time. If the bill has no merit the Senator is certainly able to expose it. If the report which has now been before the Senate for days and days and was copied into the RECORD is not defensible the Senator from Kansas can expose it as well as any man on this floor.

Mr. INGALLS. May I make an observation?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection whatever to the consideration of the Japanese indemnity bill. The appeal that I have made is simply that we may be allowed to spend the interval between half past twelve and two o'clock in the consideration of cases on the Calendar. I am entirely ready to concur with a majority, whenever the court of appeals bill may be out of the way, to take up this case or any other that the Senate may desire to consider.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I understand that the Japanese bill is so situated that it can be called under the Anthony rule at any moment. I do wish that the Senator from Kansas would permit it to come before the Senate under the Anthony rule. I will agree with the Senator that if he will propose any modification of the Anthony rule that will bring more efficiency into the business here, I will take hold with him, and I presume all will, to so amend it; but the time spent discussing the defects of the Anthony rule is enough to secure the passage of a bill like this. It seems to me it is a reproach to the United States to decline to consider it or to defer its consideration. It is a bill which has been in substance before Congress for ten years, and it is a reproach to the United States that they hold on to that money which they confess themselves they have no right to retain. The time consumed in discussing the defects of the Anthony rule I am sure would be enough to pass the bill. I hope the Senator from Kansas will consent.

Mr. MORGAN. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts and also to the Senator from Kansas that my object in making the motion before we reached the Anthony rule was simply to avoid the necessity of moving in the Senate to enlarge the time for debate, believing the bill could be disposed of this morning. I, of course, can call it under my privilege under the Anthony rule when that rule becomes operative, but it will be limited to five minutes' debate.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Alabama if the case can be called up under the Anthony rule, why not call it up and let us go on with it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is another case unfinished under the Anthony rule. This bill will be in order to be called up as soon as the pending case, which has the right of way, is disposed of. Does the Senator from Alabama withdraw his motion?

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw my motion, and give notice that at the termination of the present bill I shall ask the Senate to take up the Japanese indemnity bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be in order to be taken up under the Anthony rule then, because it has been passed over without prejudice.

Mr. MORGAN. That is when the L. Madison Day case is disposed of, but I fear from the course of the debate on the L. Madison Day case that it will not be disposed of in a few months.

Mr. HARRIS. I give notice that if the debate on the L. Madison Day case is not promptly closed, I shall interpose an objection to the further consideration of that bill.

L. MADISON DAY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 73) for the relief of L. Madison Day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have great respect for the Judiciary Committee, for the talent and fidelity of its members, but this claim has been referred to the proper committee of this body, and if that committee does not rank—about which I express no opinion—if it is to be understood that it does not rank as high as the Judiciary Committee, it at least is supposed to be competent to discharge the duties which this body has imposed upon it. That committee has considered this matter very maturely and has made a report. We do not ask the Senate to adopt our report. We have reported the bill to the Senate in the discharge of our duties with such lights as were before us. We are willing that the Senate shall review and reverse our action, but so far as I am concerned as one of the members of the Committee on Claims, I am indisposed where a matter has been properly referred to us, and where it has been considered by that committee, that the Senate shall take such action as will amount to a reflection on the committee by granting an appeal to or a supervision of the work of that committee by another committee. I am willing to accord to the Judiciary Committee all the honor, and all the respect, and all the confidence that it is entitled to, but I am unwilling as a member of one of the properly organized committees of this body which has conscientiously and laboriously discharged its duties with reference to a matter referred to it by the Senate, to have that matter taken from it and referred to another committee. I hope the motion will not prevail.

I am informed by the Senator who sits at my left, [Mr. JONAS,] and who is more familiar with the proceedings of this body than I, that it would be proper now for me to submit such observations to the Senate as I may see proper in defense of the report made by the Committee on Claims, and that being in order, I shall now proceed to do so.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that there has been some strange misapprehension as to the rule which ought to govern this body in determining upon the propriety of the passage of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time is out.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, for the purpose of enabling this bill to be discussed I object to it in order to enable a majority to take it up. If the Senator will move to take the bill up, I shall vote with him.

Mr. GEORGE. I move to take it up.

Mr. SHERMAN. As all the other Senators who have spoken on this bill against it have been allowed to go on more than five minutes, I think it would be very discourteous to the Senator from Mississippi, who is one of the committee who reported the bill, not to allow him to reply.

Mr. GEORGE. I claim no extra courtesy.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the rule be waived as to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. INGALLS. I withdraw my objection, then, if that is the understanding.

Several SENATORS. Go on! Go on!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi can proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. GEORGE. The case, sir, is a very simple one, and the rules of law, as I understand them, which are applicable to it are also very simple. The facts, as I understand them, are these: under an act of Congress which provided for the forfeiture of the lands and the estate of certain parties who were engaged on the confederate side in the late war proceedings were had for the purpose of enforcing the forfeitare and realizing the proceeds of the property in question to the United States Treasury. That law—and I desire to call the Senate's especial attention to this point—provided for a proceeding in rem for a seizure of the property. As the preliminary step in the judicial proceedings this property was seized. It was in the possession of the United States. It was brought before a United States court. A libel was filed charging it to be the property of Mr. Benjamin. A decree was rendered forfeiting the property to the United States and directing the sale of it for the purpose of getting the money into the Treasury. During the progress of that and similar causes the judge of the district court, the United States judge, the officer and agent and instrument of the United States, appointed by law for the purpose of asserting the rights of the United States to this property, made an order directing the cancellation of all mortgages and liens upon the property. The marshal who had seized the property as the officer and agent of the United States made the sale, and at the time of the sale he produced a certificate of cancellation of the mortgage to the purchaser, and sold it as exempt from the lien, the purchaser and the marshal and the court—that is, the purchaser and the United States, because the United States were acting through their court and through their marshal—all believing that this mortgage had been properly canceled.

Mr. LAPHAM. Right there will the Senator allow me to put an inquiry?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. LAPHAM. Was the holder of the mortgage a party to the proceedings?

Mr. GEORGE. No, sir.

Mr. LAPHAM. Then how could any such order affect her or him?

Mr. GEORGE. I will explain that for the benefit of the Senator from New York. It was a proceeding in rem, and I will now read some authorities which go to show, and which do show, that in all proceedings in rem, when property is sold thereunder, it is sold exempt from all claims or liens of all persons, whether they be parties or not.

I read from an opinion delivered by Judge Story in 3d Wheaton:

> Where property is seized and libeled as forfeited to the Government, the sole object of the suit is to ascertain whether the seizure be rightful and the forfeiture incurred or not. The decree of the court in such case acts upon the thing itself and binds the interests of all the world whether any party actually appears or not. If it is condemned the title of the property is completely changed, and the new title acquired by the forfeiture travels with the thing in all its future progress. (Gelston vs. Hoyt, 3 Wheaton, 318.)

This is a decision made by the Supreme Court of the United States. Now here is a similar decision made by the Supreme Court of Louisiana, in which State and under whose laws this sale was made.

> The proceedings were in rem. By the monition, every one who could have asserted a right to or in the property libeled was a party to the suit, and the judgment, consequently, is a complete bar to all rights which could have been exercised there. (Bauduc's Syndics vs. Nicholson et al., Louisiana Reports, volume 4, page 85.)

It is true that these rules, well-known rules, undisputed rules, recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States and by every other court as applicable to proceedings in rem, it has been since held did not apply to this case. I will read the statute, however, to show that the proceedings were directed to be in rem:

> That to secure the condemnation and sale of any of such property, after the same shall have been seized, so that it may be made available for the purpose aforesaid, proceedings in rem shall be instituted, &c. (Section 7, act approved July 17, 1862, 12 Statutes at Large, page 591.)

I make this answer to the Senator from New York who has just put a question to me, that by well-settled principles of law Mr. Day had a right to presume and the judge of the court who made the order had a right to presume that he had the power to make this sale free from the mortgage. It is true that afterward these rules of law, universally applicable to proceedings in rem, were decided in the Supreme Court not to apply to this particular class of cases. But there was good ground to believe at the time, there was good ground for the conviction on the part of Mr. Day, there was good ground to justify the mistake if a mistake was made on the part of the judge, assuming that the power existed to cancel this mortgage when the mortgagee was not before the court, and I assert now that it was by a new and a strained and, I might say, an unanticipated application of rules of law to these proceedings in rem which deprived that judgment of the force ordinarily allowed to judgments in proceedings of this sort.

It is to be remembered, Mr. President, that the court had good authority for holding that it had the power to make the order, that Mr. Day had good authority for supposing it had that power, and I say that under these circumstances it is not fair on the part of the United States, when one of its courts, its agent, selected by it for the purpose of acquiring this property, acting in good faith, according to well settled principles of law, made this decision—I say it is not fair under these circumstances for the United States now, having got the benefit of it, having got the money produced by it, through another court or because that other court of the United States has decided that the mortgage could not be cut out, to keep the money in their Treasury which was put there through this mistake.

I think on that ground alone we ought to refund this money. I do not think the Government of the United States can afford to keep in its Treasury money which was put there solely by an honest mistake made by its own judge and its own marshal by which a citizen of the United States was deluded into parting with money for which the United States parted with nothing.

But it is said that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies; that the law is that Mr. Day should have examined into this matter himself; that he should have been wiser than the judge; that he should have known that the representation made to him by the marshal was a fallacious one. I say, sir, that the doctrine of caveat emptor does not apply to such a case, and I will proceed to read from the very highest authority in the United States; and I speak deliberately and with measured terms when I say "the highest authority in the United States." Here is a decision made by Chancellor Kent, than whom there is no higher authority here or elsewhere, and never will be:

> On the sale of premises, under two mortgages, it was represented that the property was free from all incumbrances; but after the sale and the master's report it was discovered that the property was subject to a city assessment and tax; and the purchaser, therefore, refused to complete the purchase unless the incumbrances were removed.

Those were the facts. Here is what the judge said on those facts:

> The CHANCELLOR. The facts stated in the petition and report remain uncontradicted. The premises, at the time of the sale, were represented to be free and clear from all incumbrances—

As was the exact case here; the property was represented by the marshal to be free from all incumbrances—> and the master's report contains no allegation to the contrary. It likewise contains the evidence of the fact of such incumbrances, and the certificates show that the evidence of them came to the master's knowledge since the sale.

That master was the one who made the sale.

> The purchaser ought not to be held to his purchase under these circumstances, and we must intend that the lot was sold, and was purchased with the understanding that the title was clear, and that the price bid is to be taken as a fair and adequate consideration for the premises, free from incumbrances. It is therefore just, and for the interest of all parties, that the purchaser, or the master for him, should be at liberty to apply part of the purchase-money in discharge of the incumbrances. (Lawrence against Carnell and others, 4 Johnson's Chancery Reports, 542, 543, and 544.)

And what is the difference between applying the purchase-money to remove the incumbrance and returning it to the purchasers when the incumbrance has been enforced and the property has been lost? Here is a case, sir, exactly in point. I read now from the decision of one of the ablest courts in the American Union, where a purchaser at a sheriff's sale was relieved simply because of a mistake of the plaintiff in the execution:

> If the plaintiff points out—> and shows land, he holds out to the world that the land on which he directs his execution to be levied is subject to the payment of his debt. If he has been instrumental in causing land to be sold by the sheriff, when the defendant in the execution had no interest in it, he has no just cause of complaint when a purchaser resists the payment.

Says the court—

Mr. BUTLER. What case is that?

Mr. GEORGE. 2 J. J. Marshall's Reports, page 35, Wolford vs. Phelps.

> It was the plaintiff's fault to endeavor to make his debt of property not owned by his debtor, and can only be regarded as a fraud on the rights of others.

It was the fault of the United States, who was plaintiff and whose officer was judge and whose officer was marshal, to endeavor to condemn and put into its Treasury property which did not belong to the defendant or the party who was charged with treason.

Again the court says:

> We do not perceive any insuperable reason founded in public policy, we know of no express adjudication, and we cannot find any principle of morality which prohibits a purchaser at sheriff's sale from asking at the hands of the chancellor relief against a sale-bond executed without consideration, through a fraud practiced upon him or through mistake. Consequently, we shall not estop the complainant in this case by saying to him caveat emptor.

That is not all. I read next from another decision of that court, (Dana's Report, volume 3, page 550:)

> If a plaintiff in execution has been instrumental in causing the property of a stranger to be sold, we can see no principle of reason or of law that would exonerate him from responsibility to the purchaser.

That is exactly what the United States did here. It caused to be sold the property of a stranger to the proceeding, not Mr. Benjamin.

> The exhibition and sale of property by an individual as his own is regarded by law as sufficient to make him a warrantor of the title.

And here let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the United States was selling this property as its own. It had no money demand against Mr. Benjamin; it had no judgment against him which it was seeking to enforce and collect out of his property. It was seeking to enforce its own title to Mr. Benjamin's property, and the result of the decision was that the property belonged to the United States, not to Mr. Benjamin, and the sale made was a sale of United States property or of what interest the United States might have in it, when in fact the United States had no interest. The United States sold the property as their own; they induced the purchaser, through their own court, through their own marshal, to believe that they did own the property; they got the money; they parted with nothing for the money; and now it is said that we have a right to keep this money and to turn this party out of court because it is said he ought to have been wiser than the Federal judge, wiser than the Federal marshal; he ought to have been too astute, too smart to have parted with his money under the circumstances. I say, sir, the United States cannot afford to keep money obtained in that way.

Mr. LAPHAM. I ask the indulgence of the Senator to make an inquiry. The cases to which the honorable Senator has referred are obviously cases where there was a mistake in fact as to the existence of a tax or lien upon the property. This is a case where the title of the mortgagee was known, and the court assumed to sell in defiance of that title. Suppose it had been known that the legal title in the property was in a person loyal to the Government of the United States, and under a pretense of confiscating the title of Judah P. Benjamin the court was selling the property of a loyal man, and subsequently the true owner had asserted his title and recovered the property, would the purchaser have any remedy?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to inquire would the United States keep the money in that case?

Mr. LAPHAM. That is another question. I am only inquiring as to the rule of law.

Mr. GEORGE. If the money is in the Treasury of the United States, how then?

Mr. LAPHAM. That is another question. I am only suggesting the application of the legal principle which the Senator from Mississippi has been stating.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, Mr. President, if the parties believed that the United States had title, and if that belief was produced by the officer of the United States, by the judge of the United States, by the marshal of the United States, it seems to me that would be a mistake for which the purchaser ought to be relieved. It is impossible to suppose that the purchaser bought the property knowing that he was getting no title. It is impossible to suppose that the United States, through their judge and through their marshal, proposed to sell property to which they knew they had no title. Those would be mere sham proceedings; they would be the acts not of sensible men, but of lunatics, crazy people. The idea of a man setting up property for sale and declaring at the time "this is not my property;" and the idea that a man who is present and hears the declaration, and who knows the property and knows he gets no title, parted with the full value of the property in exchange for nothing. That can only be the act of a lunatic.

Mr. President, it is said that this order was void. Well, suppose it was void. The sale was made under it. Now, I desire to ask any lawyer in the Senate if there is a principle of law better settled than that a sale made under a void decree imposes no obligation on the purchaser to pay, and confers no right upon the vendor to receive the money. That never was disputed, and in the wildest application of the doctrine of caveat emptor it never has been applied to a case where a sale was made under a void order of a court; and the highest equity that Mr. Day has for the return of this money is the establishment of the fact that the proceedings were null and void. What is a null and void proceeding? It is just no proceeding at all, and the result——

Mr. VEST. I do not want to interrupt the line of the Senator's argument, but I wish to call his attention to the fact that this sale was not made under that order which eliminated the mortgage, but was made under a judgment of the court under the confiscation act. That judgment was good, and sold the interest of Judah P. Benjamin; but the collateral order, the order of the court as to canceling mortgages, was absolutely void and amounted to nothing.

Mr. GEORGE, I know very well the maxim that utile per inutile non vitiatur, but that has never been applied to this extent. Where that part of the proceeding which is acknowledged to be void was the foundation, the substratum under which they acted, then it has the same effect as if the whole was void.

Now, Mr. President, we are to construe the whole record together. The Senator from Missouri will understand that you cannot alone look at one part of it and say that is valid, and at another part of it and say that is invalid and void, unless they be separate and independent of each other. If one depends upon the other, if that which is valid can have no force and effect except in connection with and as modified by the invalid order, it is just the same as if the whole proceeding was invalid.

Mr. President, I have but one word more to say and then I will quit. We are not to try this question upon a point of law. The question is whether the United States can consistently and fairly and with justice to their citizens retain this money which they acquired from him upon the pretense, upon the assertion, and upon the judgment made by their own judge, by their own marshal, their own instrument, selected for the purpose of enforcing their laws? Can they retain this money acquired under these circumstances when they parted with nothing for it? That is the question. If you can afford to do that, then you will reject this bill.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, this property purchased by Mr. Day was condemned in the district court of the United States as the property of J. P. Benjamin. The proceedings were not against J. P. Benjamin, but against certain lots of land alleged to be the property of J. P. Benjamin, and as such they were condemned, the court finding those lots to be the property of J. P. Benjamin. Whether Joseph Benjamin had any title to that property or not was a matter which concerned neither Mr. Day nor any other person. It was a matter for inquiry in the original proceeding, and when this property was exposed for sale by the marshal, and when it was purchased by Mr. Day, it was purchased, as the Senator from Mississippi says, as property belonging to the United States, condemned as rebel property, formerly the property of J. P. Benjamin, a rebel, and exposed for sale under the confiscation act as such condemned property.

Mr. Day bought that property. Mr. Smith, Mr. Brown, Mr. White, Mr. Jones, or any other person, might have purchased the property. It was exposed at judicial sale, and what representations were made by the marshal? It does not concern this case that Mr. Day is a lawyer, no matter how able or how industrious in his profession. The humblest and most ignorant man might have occupied Mr. Day's place, might have purchased the property. It did not become him, and it was no part of his duty, to inquire into the process by which this property had been confiscated. He found the United States, under United States process, and by its officers, offering this property for sale, and had a right to purchase provided we are prepared to admit, as I think we all are, that the United States had a right to pass the confiscation act, to confiscate property, and to sell that property, and that persons had a right to purchase it. Before the sale of this property the following order had been obtained:

On motion of Rufus Waples, United States attorney, and M. Taylor, esq., attorney for the marshal, on suggesting that the eighth section of the act to suppress insurrection, &c., approved July 17, 1862, that the several courts aforesaid (the United States district courts) shall have power to make such orders, establish such forms and decree and sale, and direct such deeds and conveyances to be executed and delivered by the marshal thereof, where real estate shall be the subject of sale, as shall fully and efficiently effect the purposes of this act, and vest in the purchasers of such property good and valid titles thereto, it is ordered that, in all cases where real estate is condemned and sold under the act aforesaid, the marshal shall cause all mortgages resting against the property to be sold to be canceled, and shall attach the certificate of the recorder of mortgages to the deeds given to the purchasers, showing the cancellation of the same. It is further ordered that purchasers of property deposit the amount of their bids with the marshal, subject to distribution by the court, after fixing the cost, the State, national, city, and drainage taxes to be paid, the receipts therefor to be attached to the deeds given.

It is not alleged that either Mr. Day in person or any other purchaser of confiscated property had anything to do with the procurement of this order. It was obtained on the motion of the district attorney, and it was also upon the motion of Hon. Miles Taylor, special counsel appointed by the United States. Mr. Miles Taylor was one of the most distinguished lawyers the State of Louisiana has ever produced, and he practiced law in that forum for forty years. He was a contemporary of Mr. Benjamin and a man distinguished in all the courts of the State as one of her most eminent lawyers. He was a man who sat for eight years in the other end of this Capitol as a member of Congress representing one of the districts of New Orleans, and who withdrew from his seat when his State seceded in company with Mr. Benjamin, also sharing the fortunes of the confederacy. Therefore, whether this order was improvident or not, whether the district court had the right to issue the order or not, it was obtained by eminent and honest counsel, one of whom at least stood the peer of any at the bar of Louisiana.

Under that order the marshal canceled the mortgage existing on this property, and the deed executed to Day was a deed which stipulated, as the marshal said at the sale, that the United States sold the fee of the property. The marshal annexed to the deed a certificate of the recorder of mortgages for the parish of Jefferson, in which the property was situated, dated May 12, 1865, stating that "the aforesaid mortgage from Benjamin to Micou has been this day canceled and annulled upon the record of this office."

The granting clause in the marshal's deed to Day is:

Now, therefore, know all men by these presents, that I, the United States marshal aforesaid, in consideration of the premises, and by virtue of the laws in such case made and provided, and under the authority of the acts of Congress of the 6th of August, 1861, the 17th of July, 1862, and the 3d of March, 1863, in relation to confiscation, do hereby sell, transfer, assign, and set over unto the said L. Madison Day, as aforesaid, his heirs, administrators, executors, and assigns, all and singular the above-described property, with all the buildings and improvements thereon, rights, ways, privileges, hereditaments, and appurtenances to the same belonging and in any wise appertaining, to have and to hold the above-described property, with all the buildings and improvements thereon, rights, ways, &c., unto the said L. Madison Day, his heirs and assigns, as aforesaid, to his and their proper use, benefit, and behoof forever.

Thus Mr. Day bought at public sale (made by an officer of the United States, executing the decree of the United States court) this property, with notice that there existed no lien or mortgage upon it, the mortgage having been canceled, and he bought what the court ordered to be sold, whether it had the right to sell or not, the fee-simple title to this property.

It has been alleged, and much prejudice created by the allegation, that it is absurd to presume that Mr. Day, a prominent and experienced lawyer, should have supposed that he was buying or that the Government could sell the fee-simple to this property, or that the Government could sell this property free from the mortgage that existed upon it. I say, Mr. President, that if Mr. Day had this opinion he stood not single and alone, and it was pardonable in him if he should have had it, because, and it is within the knowledge of every lawyer who sits around me, that during the war when these confiscation sales were taking place, and after the war when the purchasers had entered into possession of the property, it was the opinion of a large portion of the bar of the Union, and perhaps of a majority, that despite the declaratory act of Congress and despite the message of President Lincoln, these sales, made under proceedings in rem against the property, had divested the whole title not only of the rebel, but of his heirs, and vested the fee-simple in the purchaser. Mr. Day was not the only person who carried his case to the Supreme Court and resisted the attempt there of the heirs or mortgagees to recover the property to the last extent.

Before this case of Mr. Day went to the Supreme Court of the United States there had been half a dozen or more cases decided on suits brought by the heirs of deceased persons whose estates had been confiscated to recover them back, and it was only some time after the war had ended, a long time after these sales in confiscation had ceased, before the Supreme Court of the United States—I think the first case was the case of Bigelow vs. Forrest—decided that it was only competent for Congress to confiscate the life estate of a rebel, and that the property after his death vested in his heirs. So this was not a mistake of Mr. Day alone.

It has been sought to reflect on Mr. Day because he purchased confiscated property. He is called a speculator. It is not alleged that he committed a crime. If the confiscation act was a legal one, if it existed on the statute-book, if the courts of the United States enforced it, Mr. Day or any other man, I submit, had a perfect right to purchase property sold under it; and it does not lie in our mouths here to-day to cavil either at those who executed the law or those who profited by it.

I know Mr. Day very well, and have known him for years. He was a respectable member of the bar of Louisiana; he was an old Whig and a Union man, and when secession came and the war he took the Union side, and took it consistently and honestly. I knew him well. He was a Union man at a time when there was danger and no profit in being a Union man; and he has not sought to draw profit from having been a Union man since the war has ended. He has always been, as far as I know, with his people, a good and law-abiding citizen.

Mr. Day in purchasing this property did no injury to Mr. Benjamin. If Mr. Day had not bought it, Mr. Brown, Mr. White, or Mr. Jones would have done so: and Mr. Benjamin had no interest in it, because it was forfeited to the United States by the act of Congress and proceedings taken thereunder; and Mr. Day bought this property as he had a right to do.

Mr. Day, it is said, bought it as a speculator, and paid a speculative price for it, and took the chances. Why, Mr. President, he paid the full cash value of the property at the time if he had bought the fee to him and his heirs forever. He paid some $5,400, I think, for the property. He afterward spent some $3,000 on it in making improvements and repairs, because he bought it to reside in, and he resided in it until he was disseized of it under the decision of the Supreme Court. That made it cost to him some $8,400; and yet in times of comparative prosperity, in times when property had acquired a much larger value, that property was sold to my colleague, Mr. ELLIS, the present member of Congress from the second district of Louisiana, for $10,000, one-half cash. Everybody knows that during the war, and with the doubtful issue of war, property had little or no value, and could not produce more than 50 per cent. of its actual value in the city of New Orleans.

Was it to be supposed that Mr. Day, at least a sensible business man, was going to put $5,400 of his own into a property covered by a deed of mortgage to a larger amount, which would not bring any more than that under the hammer if the sale passed a title indefeasible to him and his heirs forever; that he was going to pay that for a mere life estate on the life of a man then over fifty years of age and a title that was not good and was subject to litigation and subject to defeasment by the enforcement of a mortgaged lien? Mr. President, it is preposterous. Mr. Day gave the best evidence of his sincerity by paying the full cash price for which he could have bought similar property, the fee simple, free from incumbrance, in that portion of the city anywhere that he chose to invest.

Now he is accused of having attempted to swindle a poor widow and orphans out of their money. I know the widow and orphans. They are my friends. I rejoice that they gained the case in yonder court. I rejoice that they recovered their money. I think they were entitled to it. They had no notice and they never came forward to take part in these proceedings in the United States courts. If they had come and taken part we never should have heard of this case, and Mr. Day would never have been disseized of his property. I rejoice that they recovered the property; but in what has Mr. Day injured them? Mr. Day bought this property free from their mortgage so far as the action of the United States court could make it so. Mr. Day bought this property, and to the best of his knowledge and belief the money he paid for the property went to these mortgagees, and of course, no matter how large the mortgage, the mortgagee could only get what the property brought, having the right to come in and purchase herself.

Suppose Mrs. Micou and her children had been made parties to this suit; suppose they had been notified of this suit; suppose they had come in and under the privilege of mortgage creditors had purchased the property; suppose they had purchased it for the full extent of their mortgage, which they could have done without paying out a dollar; what would have become of their estate after the death of J. P. Benjamin? They would have purchased the life estate, as Mr. Day purchased the life estate, and they would not have been in as good a position as they are to-day.

Mr. President, as I said the other day, in Louisiana one who makes a sale is held to be a guarantor. He guarantees the existence of the thing he sells; he guarantees the title to it. If through any cause a party purchasing in good faith is evicted from the property, he has recourse against the seller as a guarantor; and the same thing applies to a judicial sale, with this exception, that in judicial sales he has his warranty against both the plaintiff and defendant, but he must first execute it against the defendant, and on a return that the defendant has no property he can then obtain a judgment against the plaintiff. Mr. Benjamin was no debtor; Mr. Benjamin owed nothing to the United States. Mr. Benjamin was a rebel, and the United States said that the property of rebels was forfeited. The United States took the property of Mr. Benjamin, and they had a right to use it so far as the United States was concerned, and no recourse could be had against the defendant.

All the property of Mr. Benjamin was exhausted; everything he had was confiscated. It is matter of history that since the war Mr. Benjamin has not lived in this country, but has attained great fame and fortune across the sea. Therefore it would have been a mere matter of supererogation to have issued an execution against Mr. Benjamin; nothing could have been effected. As a matter of course, Mr. Day could not sue the Government. He could not bring his action against the United States any more than he could bring his action against the State of Louisiana if the State of Louisiana had sold his property for taxes without a right to do so, but he could have gone to the Legislature of Louisiana and asked for a return of the money as he comes to Congress to make a similar demand. The court did not give that money to Mrs. Micou, the mortagee; the money was turned over to the Treasury of the United States, where it is now.

The Senator from Missouri says that this case must be distinguished from that of an individual. There can be no question if an individual had made this sale he would have been held to warrant the title under the law of Louisiana. Will it be pretended that the United States can change the laws of Louisiana? She can enforce her judgment; she can sell property; she can issue execution; but if she issues executions she must do it under the State laws. Section 916 of the Revised Statutes says that judicial sales, proceedings, and remedies generally must be according to the laws of the State, provided such remedies existed before the passage of that statute.

Mr. President, there is no question of public policy which discriminates between the United States and the individual, except merely the privilege of the United States that she cannot be sued by a citizen; but the Senator says it is a matter of public policy. The Senator says that this money was used for the purpose of carrying on the war and maintaining the Union armies, and therefore it cannot be disposed of now. That was the policy of the confiscation act, and whose money did the confiscation act propose should be used for carrying on the war? It was the money of Mr. Benjamin; it was the forfeited property of Mr. Benjamin; it was to be confiscated; it was to be put into the Treasury; it was to be used for war purposes. Did the act contemplate that the property of Mr. Day, a loyal Union man, sympathizing and siding with the Government to the best of his ability, was to be used, that the money was to be taken from Mr. Day by forced contribution and used for the purpose of supporting the Government and carrying on the war? No, Mr. President, the money is in the Treasury.

Mr. Day has suffered this loss through the fault of the Government and the Government's officers; he has suffered it through such means as would give him a good action at law in the forum where the property was sold against any individual, and there is no reason why the Government, having this money and having sold Mr. Day nothing; having been the means through its officers of perpetrating a swindle upon Mr. Day by pretending to sell him something that did not exist, that is, the title of J. P. Benjamin to this property; and by pretending to sell him something free from lien when that property was covered with a mortgage which the Supreme Court held to be good, and which left it without any value whatever; the Government having perpetrated this wrong on Mr. Day, it is nothing more than just and equitable that his money should be restored by the Government.

I find in the sixty-ninth volume of Missouri Reports the case of Griffith vs. Townley, even in Missouri, a case decided almost similar, except that the United States was not a party. The syllabus of the case is as follows:

An administrator sold lands of his intestate, supposing that it was the fee that he was selling. The purchaser supposed it was the fee that he was buying. It turned out that nothing passed by the sale but the equity of redemption. Held, that this was such a case of mixed and mutual mistake of law and fact as entitled the purchaser to relief in equity.

And he recovered his money back. The court in this decision quoted from two or three cases, which I will also quote from briefly:

In King vs. Doolittle, 1 Head (Tenn.) 77, it was held that where the mistake was one both of law and fact, though the latter is the result of the former, relief will be granted when justice and equity require it.

In this case representations were made in the bill of sale which did not exist, made by an administrator. They turned out to be misrepresentations, and the party purchasing claimed his money back.

And the court there said: "If a contract is entered into in good faith, by which it is mutually understood that, for an adequate consideration, the one party shall part with and the other acquire a valid title to property, and it turn out that at the time of the contract, by the operation of some settled principle of law of which they were alike ignorant, the supposed title was wholly valueless or did not exist in legal contemplation; in such cases, the mistake is not a mere mistake at law; it involves, in some measure, a mistake of fact as well as of law, as the very idea of title comprehends as well matter of fact as of law. * * * It is enough that there was a radical defect inherent in the subject-matter of the contract, of which the parties were mutually ignorant. * * * The contract, therefore, was not what either of the parties understood and intended it should be." In that case the mutual mistake arose because of an omission of an essential provision of the charter of a bank, the copy furnished being unintentionally imperfect. Here the mutual mistake occurred because of the inadvertent insertion of words of which both parties were ignorant; words in the order of sale at variance with the petition for that order, with the publication, and with the certificate of appraisement. The parties bargained for the fee and there was, under the administration proceedings, no fee for sale. The subject-matter of their contract had, in legal contemplation, no more existence than if it had been a dwelling already consumed by fire or a messuage already swept away by a flood. Both parties intended the purchase and sale of a subsisting thing, and implied its existence as the basis of their contract. It constituted, therefore, the very essence and condition of the obligation of their contract." (1 Story, Eq. Jur., sec. 142.)

The court says, speaking of the case at bar:

The mutual mistake is to be attributed to the agent of the defendants.

The marshal was an agent of the United States. The judge cannot be called an agent of the United States, but he was there administering justice in a suit in which the United States was a plaintiff, and the decree was the property of the United States.

He prepared the deed, and he assured the complainant that it was correct. There was no want of ordinary prudence in the complainant's relying upon his judgment. He was a lawyer by profession, and it was natural and becoming that the complainant should have confided in him. To the same effect are Woodbury, &c., Bank vs. Charter Oak Insurance Company, 31 Conn., 517; Longhurst vs. Star Insurance Company, 19 Iowa, 364. In conclusion, we are of opinion that there are, in this case, such elements of absence of consideration, of reliance on the representations of the agent of the estate, of surprise, mutual mistake and unconscionable advantage, as should in equity and good conscience take this case out of the general rule, and forbid our sanctioning the decree; for should we approve that decree, we would thereby, in effect, declare that the heirs of Lewis Welton's estate should retain the unconscionable advantage which they have gained, and become enriched by the very debt of their ancestor.

I think that this case in its main bearings is precisely a counterpart. I hope that the case of the claimant here will not be prejudiced by the exordium to his brief, which was read yesterday. It was not the first case, I submit, in which the old adage applies that "a man who is his own lawyer," &c. I will not continue the quotation.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I just wish to say a word in regard to the case stated by the Senator from Louisiana and the decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri. I say respectfully to my friend that the decision he has read has no more to do with this case than the laws of the Sandwich Islands or of Kamschatka. That was a case in which sale was made by an administrator, and there was an inadvertent mistake in regard to the facts of the case and both parties participated in it; exactly like the case in which there was a mistake in regard to the charter of a bank where the copy that was furnished to the banks left out material words containing certain important provisions.

What are the facts here? This man Day knew that the Constitution prohibited anything but the sale of the life estate of Judah P. Benjamin. He knew what the order of the court was to sell the property of Judah P. Benjamin. He knew what he was buying.

Mr. JONAS. Will my friend permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. JONAS. The order of the court, I submit, was not to sell the property of Judah P. Benjamin; the order of the court was to sell certain lots of ground, I do not know how many, the property of Judah P. Benjamin which had been confiscated.

Mr. VEST. I am a lawyer by profession, but I have never been able to draw the distinction quite as fine as my brother from Louisiana. The order of the court was to sell certain lots, the property of Judah P. Benjamin, and the Supreme Court of the United States construed that decree to mean, as it could only mean, that it sold the interest of Judah P. Benjamin and nothing more. Here is the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States before me now, and the Supreme Court decides that the district court of Louisiana could not have sold anything else. There can be no pretense that they sold anything else.

What did Mr. Day claim? He claimed that he bought the interest of Judah P. Benjamin and of Joseph Benjamin, and got rid of a mortgage of $10,000, spread on the records in 1858, and he, a lawyer, says now that his ignorance ought to be protected. I hold the doctrine of equity to be that when facts exist which put any man on inquiry in regard to other facts, then he is bound to know them all, and if he does not know them it is gross negligence, willful and deliberate negligence. This is the case, and I desire to say nothing else about it. Mr. Day has made a bad speculation and wants to saddle the result of his bad judgment and his worse venture upon the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have spoken once on this matter. Have I the right to speak again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir; not except by unanimous consent.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator has not spoken on the motion to recommit.

Mr. HOAR. I shall not ask unanimous consent; I would rather have a vote.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The pending motion is to recommit the bill.

Mr. FRYE, and others. Let us have a vote.

Mr. HARRIS. This bill has taken up the morning hour for three or four mornings.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will understand that I do not ask for unanimous consent; I waive my desire to speak.

Mr. HARRIS. I am not inclined to object to hearing the Senator, except that I am inclined to object to the further consideration of the bill unless we can come to a vote at once. I am ready to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Let the yeas and nays be taken on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is lost. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. VEST and others. Let us have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this bill with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. MILLER, of California, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] I do not know how he would vote if he were here.

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] is necessarily detained from the Senate for a portion of the day, and while absent he is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. ROLLINS. I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JACKSON.]

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Blair,	George,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,
Call,	Groome,	Kellogg,	Pugh,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	McDill,	Sawyer,

So the bill was passed.

CHARLES M. BLAKE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] call up the Japanese indemnity bill, or will he wait until to-morrow?

Mr. MORGAN. I will not call it up under the Anthony rule to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next case on the Calendar will be called.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1015) for the relief of Charles M. Blake.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I desire to modify my amendment by inserting, as the time at which the payment shall be made, from April 28, 1869, to July 2, 1870.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read as modified.

The ACTING SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment of the committee it is proposed to add:

And the said Charles M. Blake shall be paid as post chaplain in the Army of the United States from the 28th day of April, 1869, to the 2d day of July, 1870; and the proper accounting officers of the United States are authorized and directed to audit and allow such payment when made.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs decided the case, and this is a reversal of the decision of the committee whose report has been read. As I understand the amendment of the Senator from California, it is to allow Mr. Blake pay from the 28th day of April, 1869, to the 14th day of May, 1878.

Mr. MILLER, of California. No; I have changed that so as to pay him until July 2, 1870.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not know the Senator had modified his amendment.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I have changed it so as to pay him from April 28, 1869, to July 2, 1870; which is the time that his successor was appointed and confirmed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand. That particular point was not specially passed upon by the committee. As the amendment has been modified from what it was originally, I have nothing further to say in the matter.

Mr. GROVER. I reported this bill by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs; but I myself was in favor of the proposition of the Senator from California before the committee, and I now favor it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

The bill (S. No. 1049) amending an act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States" was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I was going to ask for the reading of the report, but I see it is somewhat lengthy and there will hardly be time to complete its reading before the hour of two o'clock will arrive.

Mr. HARRIS. As the hour of two is so nearly at hand, I have no objection to the bill going over at this time. I should like to have the report read in the morning and to make a very brief explanation of the change that this bill makes in the existing law.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is precisely what I desired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be the first case called in the morning when the Calendar is reached under the Anthony rule.

Mr. McMILLAN. The bill is not yet before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, it is reached on the Calendar.

Mr. McMILLAN. It is not to be taken up as one of the ordinary bills on the Calendar under the Anthony rule?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is taken up now under the Anthony rule, and is subject to objection, of course.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not think it ought to be considered at this time, and for that reason I object.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Tennessee proposes to allow it to go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. HARRIS. To have it go over to be the first bill called up to-morrow morning under the Anthony rule is my suggestion, because there is no time now to have the report read.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will it be subject to objection then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course.

Mr. HARRIS. Every bill is subject to objection till its conclusion, under the Anthony rule.

CHARLES ALTON HOWARD.

Mr. HARRISON. As there are only two or three minutes left of the morning hour, I should like to have the consent of the Senate to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs and to ask the passage of the bill, which is simply to change the name of an officer in the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received.

Mr. HARRISON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3196) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to change the name of Charles Alton Howard, a second lieutenant in the Ninth Regiment of Cavalry of the Army of the United States, on the register, rolls, and records of the Army, to Alton Henry Budlong, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration. The bill is simply to change the name of an officer on the Army roll, which he asks to have done, and there can be no objection to it.

Mr. PLUMB. Is it proposed to change his name by law?

Mr. HARRISON. The bill simply authorizes a change of his name on the Army rolls.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT REAL ESTATE INSURANCE.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the moment that is left of the morning hour I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4299) to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia. It is a bill of slight importance which I should like to have passed. I presume there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It amends the five hundred and fifty-third section of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia by adding after the words "life insurance" the words "or for the purpose of insuring titles to real estate."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to have the Senator from Ohio explain the effect of the bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. I reported the bill from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and can explain it to the Senator from Delaware. Under the general incorporation act of the District of Columbia corporations for the purpose of life insurance and other business purposes may exist for twenty years. This bill permits incorporations for purposes of insuring title to real estate to be perpetual instead of twenty years, because an insurance for twenty years would amount to nothing. It authorizes a corporation now existing, formed under the general law, to be perpetual. That is the only effect upon the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

CRUISE OF THE TICONDEROGA.

Mr. McPHERSON. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transmit to the Senate the official report upon the cruise of the Ticonderoga by Commodore R. W. Shufeldt.

I understand that there has been an official report published by the Navy Department. I should like to have possession of the report in order that some action may be taken upon it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is it proposed to print the report?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. McMILLAN. The resolution had better go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. McPHERSON. It is simply to have the Department send us a copy of the report which is already in their possession. However, I have no objection to a reference if it is desired.

Mr. McMILLAN. If it is simply a resolution of inquiry I have no objection to it.

Mr. PLATT. Let the resolution be read.

The Acting Secretary read the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 429) to establish a court of appeals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions, on which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] has the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. The question before the Senate, I understand, is upon the amendment of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.] I do not propose to urge the motion to recommit now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) A motion to recommit takes precedence of a motion to amend.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not formally make the motion yesterday; I merely submitted the proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator only gave notice of his intention to move hereafter to recommit, then the pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. MORGAN. I only gave the notice with a view of having the resolution of instruction printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question, then, is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] which will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 2 of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the several circuit courts of the United States shall have and exercise no jurisdiction in cases of appeals or writs of error from the district courts allowed, taken, or sued out after the 1st day of September, 1882, except that reviews in bankruptcy cases, in the exercise of their supervisory jurisdiction may be had as heretofore provided.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a short time to submit some additional observations that I desire to make upon the pending bill. In the first place, recapitulating a little what has occurred heretofore in this debate, I call the attention of the Senate to the argument which was made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] some days ago and to the observations which I made yesterday on the same point as to the meaning of the Constitution of the United States in reference to the citizenship of corporations, and I will add to what has heretofore been said upon that subject what I regard as a conclusive argument against this pretended citizenship.

Those who heard the Senator from Arkansas upon that subject will remember that he showed that while the word "citizen" had been used in the Constitution many times, yet there was nothing in the Constitution to define exactly what was meant by that term. Prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment there were diverse views entertained by statesmen and jurists as to the proper signification of the word "citizen." I believe the meaning of that term was very much litigated in the celebrated Dred Scott case. At least until the adoption of the fourteenth amendment there was no well-defined, settled, certain meaning attached to it which all statesmen and all jurists accepted as correct. Much of the controversy which culminated finally in the late civil war grew out of the difference in meaning attached to this word.

We have now a constitutional definition of what the word "citizen" means. It is no longer open to dispute; no longer a subject-matter of speculation; it has been withdrawn from that field, and the people of the United States have put in their Constitution a meaning which we are obliged to accept, and which the courts of this country are obliged to accept. That amendment, in unmistakable terms, excludes from the class of citizens the artificial beings called corporations. I will read it:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the State wherein they reside.

That is the constitutional definition of the meaning of the word "citizens." Corporations cannot be born; they are creatures merely of the legislative will. They cannot be naturalized; they can take no oath of allegiance; they can renounce no fealty to any foreign power. I proceed further to read from the amendments to fix with absolute certainty, beyond the possibility of controversy, the fact that corporations cannot be included within the class of citizens:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The whole section taken together shows that the people in inserting this article in the Constitution were referring to natural persons, persons who owed allegiance, persons entitled to the protection of the Government, and persons who are capable of serving it.

So in the fifteenth amendment, inserted in the Constitution after the adoption of the fourteenth, we have the use of the word "citizen" in a sense unmistakably excluding from it all persons except natural persons.

The right of citizens of the United States to vote—shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Says Article XV—

Here the word "citizens" is applicable alone to persons who have the capacity to vote. Corporations cannot vote, but only persons who may be of some of the races of mankind. Corporations do not belong to any race of mankind. Persons who may be of a particular color can vote. Corporations have no color. Persons who may have been in a previous condition of servitude can vote. Corporations, at least in this country, have never been in that condition. They have generally been masters, not servants, of the people.

What are corporations that they should be by the Federal courts included within the class of citizens entitled to sue and be sued in them? They are intangible and invisible; they are purely ideal beings. It has been said that they have no souls to be saved and no bodies to be punished. They have their beings under the simple legislative will of the States, a mere act of the Legislature endowing them with certain rights and powers and faculties, and imposing upon them certain duties and obligations.

In the case of artificial persons thus created, having their source, their life, their faculties, their powers solely from State law, how is it that the States which created them are to be deprived of their just power and jurisdiction over their own creatures, whose rights and powers, duties and obligations are to be settled and litigated in a foreign tribunal?

Certainly, if there be one thing more than another which ought to be an inherent attribute of a political community exercising legislative powers, passing laws regulating the interests, the rights, the privileges of those over whom they have jurisdiction, it is that, having the power to make the laws, they ought to have the power to enforce them. Yet these creatures, existing alone in law, made by the breath and the power of the law, subject to be destroyed by the same power which creates them, are by this usurped jurisdiction of the Federal courts taken from the control and power of the States which created them.

I ask Senators who are in favor of maintaining this usurped and unconstitutional authority, what good reason is there for it? I am not bound to give a reason why we should remit it to the proper authority, more than to say that the Constitution, the supreme law of the land, has so willed it; that ought to be a sufficient reason for our action upon that subject.

This usurpation of power over corporations by the Federal Government has worked very serious injury to the people of the States. Let me illustrate. There is a railroad company chartered in the State of Virginia, for instance, having one terminus of its road at Norfolk and the other at some other point in the State. It gets its right of way from the State of Virginia; it gets the power to exercise the right of eminent domain from that State; it receives from the Legislature of the State the power to ask municipal corporations, cities, towns, and counties to levy taxes to aid in its building; it receives subsidies from the treasury of the State of Virginia. It seems under these circumstances, being born of the will of the State of Virginia, deriving its powers from that authority, receiving its stock from the public treasury and from the contributions of the municipalities to which I have alluded, that the State ought to have some control over it. Yet any man who holds a bond of that road, if it be mortgaged, may go into the Federal court and may induce that court to seize property and franchises of the corporation, put them in possession of a receiver, turn out the agencies appointed by the law of the State of Virginia for the purpose of working it, and then actually operate the road under the power and direction of this court. When a receiver is appointed what is the result? He is the president of the road, he is the vice-president of the road, he is the secretary and treasurer, the directors and the stockholders. His will alone, guided and directed by the will of the Federal court from which he receives his appointment, is the law of the operation of that road.

This receiver may lose or destroy the property which is committed to the railroad company for transportation, he may destroy the lives of the passengers who travel upon his trains, and what remedy have the parties injured? They cannot sue the receiver in the State courts; they must apply to the Federal judge, and ask his permission to do what? To do that which is prescribed in every State constitution in the Union as being one of the highest rights of an American citizen—to bring an action against any person who may have injured him in person or property or reputation; and yet all these are denied in the case which I have mentioned or granted at the will and discretion of another.

It would seem that these things ought not to be unless it can be shown that the States are unwilling to exercise this judicial power fairly and impartially, and also incapable of doing it. The first branch of this proposition I discussed yesterday. Are the States incapable of doing that justice the administration of which has been usurped by the Federal tribunals? Is there any divinity in a Federal judge that makes him greater, better, purer, or more learned than the judges in the State courts? Is there anything in the agencies by which Federal judges are selected and by which State judges are selected which enables us to say that the Federal judge must be a better, a greater, and a purer man than the State judge?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me, as the Senator has had a good deal of experience in judicial matters, I should like to ask him, from his knowledge of the course of judicial business, especially in the Southern States, if there has been an increase in the business of the State tribunals arising from the increase of business and of population corresponding with that of the Federal courts?

Mr. GEORGE. There has been, so far as my observation extends, a large diminution in the business of the State courts, it being all transferred, as far as possible, to the Federal courts. Is that your observation?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is mine. Therefore this increase of business in the Federal tribunals is not to be attributed altogether to the increase of the business or population of the country, but rather to the extent of their powers.

Mr. GEORGE. I have no doubt that is a correct view.

Mr. President, I was speaking of the character of the State judges and of the Federal judges. I want to make no invidious comparison, but I desire to call to the attention of the Senate those eminent judges in this country who have illustrated and adorned the judicial history of the States and who have conferred as much honor upon the bench as the judges of the Federal courts. If you point me to Marshall, to Taney, and to Story, as great and able men on the Federal bench, I can point you to Parker, to Parsons, and to Shaw, in Massachusetts; to Kent, to Spencer, to Walworth, and to Bronson, of New York; to Hornblower, in New Jersey; to Tilghman, to Gibson, and to Rogers, in Pennsylvania; to St. George Tucker, in Virginia; to Ruffin and Gaston, in North Carolina; to De Saussure, to Harper, O'Neal, and Wardlaw, in South Carolina; to Lumpkin, in Georgia; to the two honored names in my own State, Sharkey and Smith; to Green and Turley, of Tennessee; to Chief-Justice Robertson, of Kentucky; to Hitchcock, of Ohio; and to a name, the only one now living that I will mention, bright in the annals of the law of this country, Judge Cooley, of Michigan. I may go further, sir. In a sister State, an adjoining State to Mississippi, there served in the olden time two men on its supreme bench who have done more to familiarize the American bar and bench with the study and the application of the principles of private international law than any two men who ever lived in the United States; I mean Martin and Porter, of Louisiana. These men are the equals of the proudest who have ever sat upon the Federal bench. I have not attempted to make an exhaustive enumeration of the names of eminent judges of State courts. There are hundreds of others who have sat on the highest benches of the States who would have been a credit and an honor to the Supreme Bench of the United States.

A short reference to the benefits which would accrue to the people of the United States from a remission of a portion of this jurisdiction to State courts will now be made. In the first place, the present system is founded upon distrust; upon a distrust that the States would not do their duty where one of the litigants is a non-resident and the other is a resident. I think I have sufficiently shown in the remarks I made on yesterday that there is no foundation for that; but would it not be well if we would change our system and call upon the States and put them upon their honor to see that foreign litigants received fair and impartial justice in their limits? I think it would tend to unite more firmly the States if the people of each State knew that the others trusted to their honor, to their sense of justice, to their fair dealing to render impartial justice between their own citizens and litigants from other States.

But, Mr. President, the litigation in the State courts is vastly cheaper than it is in the Federal courts. All who have had any experience of Federal courts know that the costs of a lawsuit in those courts exceed four or five hundred per cent., and often more, the costs in a State court. Every time that the marshal serves a summons, every time that he carries an execution with a view of levying it, whether he levies it or not, every time he serves a writ, he is entitled to charge mileage, and in most of the States this mileage is frequently calculated upon distances running from one hundred to two hundred and fifty miles.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment in the line of his argument?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. What is the largest sum the Senator has ever known to be allowed as costs in any State court? Has he any idea?

Mr. GEORGE. I cannot call it to mind.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will just say that in a case recently decided in the Supreme Court from my State the costs in a single cause amounted to $95,000 outside of the debt.

Mr. GEORGE. In the State court?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. In the United States court.

Mr. GEORGE. As I came to the Capitol this morning I met the junior Senator from Iowa, [Mr. McDILL,] and he informed me that he was engaged in two cases in the Federal court sitting in Iowa concerning the same property—a litigation about some cattle, in which the costs amounted to $4,000. He stated at the same time that if that litigation had been in the State courts of Iowa the cost would not have exceeded three or four hundred dollars.

The people in my section have had sad experiences in these cost bills. I know that I do not exaggerate when I say that the mere services rendered by officers and witnesses in the State courts do not cost in the average cases exceeding one-fourth of the costs in the Federal courts. This large increase of costs is a great and grievous burden. I think it is our duty to diminish it. I think it is our duty so to provide that the unfortunate suitor who may be cast in a lawsuit shall not be ruined by the expenses attending unsuccessful litigation.

If we remit this jurisdiction to the State courts we really and in fact bring to the homes and the bosoms of the people the administration of justice. Every defendant will be sued in his own county, he will have the great common-law privilege, as old as English liberty itself, of having his cause tried by a jury of the vicinage. In addition to that the people themselves will become more largely than they are now participants in the administration of justice.

He who will make the slightest reflection upon the growth, the progress, and the superiority of Anglo-Saxon institutions will find that one of the great causes of this growth and progress has been that the people themselves in the jury-box have become educated to perform high civil duties by being participants in the administration of justice.

These Federal courts are held a long way off from the homes of the people. It is true that the jurors are drawn from the State or district at large, but the trials are distant from the homes of the people; they do not witness them, and in a large majority of cases the juries are composed of those professional gentlemen who reside in and near the court-house in which the courts are held.

Another good result will come from the remission of this jurisdiction to the State courts. The tendency now is everywhere in business, in money, to centralization in the large cities. This tendency will be destroyed, or at least greatly diminished. The small towns and the villages are being dwarfed by the concentration of the money and of the business in the larger centers. Professional business follows the same course. Before this enlarged jurisdiction of the Federal courts, the State courts administered to a large extent the justice that was dispensed to the people. They had trials in every county; they had lawyers residing in every county to participate in the benefits of the litigation. Now, sir, under this system the Federal courts are held in only one or two places in a State, and the tendency is that the professional business is concentrated at these points to the great injury of the local and country bar. You hear no call from the local bar of this country for the enactment of this bill. The Senator from Illinois caused to be read at the Secretary's desk yesterday the resolutions approving this bill of the Bar Association of New York City, but he brought no approving voice from the bar of the interior of New York, and I undertake to say that if the voice, if the vote, if the preference of the bar of the United States was sought on this bill, nine-tenths of them would be in opposition to its enactment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to state that I understand that the National Bar Association, which met at Saratoga last August, disapproved of the provisions of the present bill?

Mr. GEORGE. I know it to be the fact that the concentration of this business in the Federal courts operates very disastrously on the business of the local bar in the States, operates disastrously upon the civil officers of the States, who lose their legitimate fees by their being all concentrated in the hands of the officers of the Federal tribunals.

It was said yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] that a reason why the Federal jurisdiction should be retained is that it is important not only that justice shall be fairly administered, but that the people shall be satisfied that it is fairly administered.

Now I undertake to say that the administration of this usurped jurisdiction by the Federal courts has given more dissatisfaction to the people of this country than ever arose from a suspicion that justice cannot be given to a non-resident in a State court. I have no doubt it causes satisfaction to parties who have twenty or thirty suits apiece to bring in a State to be able to bring all those suits in one court, to give them all to one lawyer, and not be compelled to attend various district and circuit courts throughout the State. While you satisfy one man of that sort, you dissatisfy many others who are sued and who are taken away from their homes and made to attend courts at a great distance from their residence, and at great expense and inconvenience.

There is another reason why we ought to remit this jurisdiction to the States. It would reform civil service to that extent. We take all the marshals and judges created by this bill from the great pool for which the Presidential contests are fought; we give the administration of justice to judges elected by the people themselves. I am one of those who believe that judges thus selected administer the law with as much impartiality and with as much ability as those selected here.

Then, again, Mr. President, the scheme of this bill is to accommodate the rich at the expense of the poor. Certainly I do not desire to say or to do anything which would excite antagonism between the classes of rich and the classes of poor in this country; but the poor people are in the majority. Are they not entitled, when so important a law as this is passed, to have their rights and to have their convenience consulted? No poor man asks for the passage of this bill. No poor man will be benefited by it. He must have $10,000 to go to the Supreme Court; he must have $500 to go to the appellate court. Is that right? Is it right for us, representing all classes, representing all conditions in life, to legislate for one to the exclusion of the others?

It is said that we ought to draw the line as is done in this bill because the large suits are the more important. More important in what? Every lawyer knows that an important principle, one as hard to determine, may arise in a case in which only $50 is involved as in a case in which a million is in litigation. But it is said the more important the amount the greater the necessity of an appeal. Important to whom? Important to the country, or important to the suitor? It more frequently happens that a small amount in litigation, a sum less than $500, affects more seriously the fortune of the litigant than a larger sum. Men who have their thousands and their millions can afford to lose a lawsuit of $5,000 or $10,000; but how is it with a man who has his all at stake, everything he has in the world, dependent upon the result of a lawsuit? If he loses he is ruined. I do not think we ought to make provision for the administration of justice based upon a distinction in wealth.

I asked the question of the Senator from Illinois yesterday if it was not more important to a poor man who had his all involved in a suit to have it correctly decided than to a rich man who had a large amount involved, but only a portion of his estate. He failed to answer. He answered only by saying, "That is the poor man's argument." I do not know exactly what is meant by that; but if he meant that an argument against a measure before the United States Senate was improper to be urged or improper to be considered because it affected injuriously or unequally the rights of the poor, I must beg leave to differ with him.

I have said that a majority of the people of the United States were poor; they will ever be so, and it is our duty, while protecting the rich in all their property, exciting no jealousies or antipathies against them, to so use the great powers with which we are intrusted that the poor men of this country and the poor women of this country shall have a fair and equal chance to advance in prosperity and to better their fortunes. These are my principles; they are the principles of the party to which I belong, and when they cease to be such I shall cease to be a member of it. I know of no higher duty that can devolve upon the American Congress within its constitutional limits than to devise measures to advance the prosperity, to promote the welfare, and to subserve the happiness of the great mass of the American people who are now, and, as I have just said, probably always will be numbered in the category of the poor.

I have detained the Senate longer than I wished on this subject. I am opposed to this bill for the reasons which I have stated. I believe that it is but another step in the direction of centralization—centralization of power in the Federal Government, centralization of the money power, centralization of business and professional power. I believe that if we add these eighteen judges to the courts of the United States, these nine new courts, we will act in opposition to a feeling which I know does pervade members on both sides of this Chamber, that the jurisdiction of the Federal courts ought to be limited and restricted instead of enlarged; it will make it more difficult for that feeling to be realized. I think we ought to meet that question now. I think we ought to resist this bill because it will stand in the way of reform, and because of itself it is opposed to reform.

I have heard it stated, I believe, on this floor that every judge of the Supreme Court of the United States except one is in favor of this bill. I have heard also that every Federal judge in the United States outside of the Supreme Court was in favor of its passage. I know with their power and influence, with their friends and their connections, it will be almost impossible to resist its passage. I have done what I regard to be my duty to resist it. I shall continue to resist it. I shall vote for every amendment which is offered to make it less oppressive to the people, less injurious to their interest. I am bound to say that I do not think any amendment can be offered to it which will make it either palatable to me or proper for the people whom I represent.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I desire to modify somewhat the amendment which I originally introduced to the bill, and which is now under consideration by the Senate. My original amendment was to strike out section 2 and to substitute another distinct section in place of it. I now propose to amend section 2 by the addition of a proviso. I make this alteration because if I were to strike out the entier section it would take away all right of appeal from the district and circuit courts in all cases, an object which I had not in view, my purpose being to retain the existing jurisdiction by appeal and writ of error from the district to the circuit court. I offer this as an amendment to the section:

Provided, That from all final decrees of a district court in causes of admiralty or of equity, except prize cases, when the matter in dispute exclusive of costs exceeds the sum or value of $50 and is under $500, an appeal shall be allowed to the circuit court from the district court in accordance with existing laws.

Final judgments of the district court when the matter in dispute exceeds $50, exclusive of costs, and is under $500, may be re examined, reversed, or affirmed in a circuit court upon writ of error.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is a modification of the amendment heretofore offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, sir. My purpose is to make this bill as acceptable as possible to the people whom I in part represent if it should become a law; and I will say now, in response to some words that dropped from the distinguished Senator who has the bill in charge, that I am not criticising this bill merely for the sake of criticism.

This, sir, is no local measure. This is a measure which affects, as I said in the outset of my argument the other day, the interests of every constituency represented on this floor. I am not seeking for any renown in the way of sensation by the discussion of this measure. There has never been a bill in the Senate since I have been a member of it more important to the people than this, or that will be watched with greater interest, and I believe that myself and the other Senators who have manifested interest in this discussion have not been animated by any desire except to serve the people whose trust we have in charge and who will hold us to rigid accountability if anything should pass this body that might be detrimental to their interests.

Sir, it has happened in the legislation of the past that much which was objectionable, much that was entitled to condemnation has gone through this body without debate; and if there is any purpose higher and greater than another that ought to be observed and carried out here, it is in exposing by open, candid debate every measure which affects the great body of the people of the United States. I remember a year or two ago the condemnation that was brought upon this Senate because of the circumstances under which silver was once demonetized, because a bill went through the Senate without debate or notice by the body which affected the entire people, and years afterward clamor came about and excitement came about because there was no debate.

It is not, therefore, capricious criticism that I am engaged in. I believe that in all cases in which the interests of the people are involved there ought to be discussion; there ought to be agitation if necessary; and I think it was the great Earl of Chatham who gave expression to a thought, which he said ought to be inscribed on the walls of every parliamentary body, that when the interests of the people are involved there ought to be agitation; there ought to be clamor; there ought to be discussion, "for it is better," he said, "that our slumbers should be broken by the fire-bell than that we should perish amid the flames in our beds."

Now, sir, I have great respect for the committee from which this bill came, and I do not think there is anybody in the Senate who has a higher respect for the honorable Senator who has it in charge than I have, and I am sorry that I cannot conscientiously concur with him in the wisdom of this measure, because I feel and I know that in all that he says he is animated by the highest purpose and motive to serve the people of the country; but out of those honest differences of opinion at times good comes and the people's interests are subserved. It is not to be expected that absolute unanimity should exist with respect to a great measure of this kind, even though it came from the Judiciary Committee. The people of the several States represented here will not excuse their representatives if this bill should prove to be unwise, because it came from that committee.

Now, sir, while I am opposed to "the scheme" of this measure as announced by the honorable Senator from Illinois, I am free to say that the amendment which I propose is not intended to load down the bill for the purpose of securing its defeat. There are usually two kinds of amendments offered to measures in parliamentary bodies. One class are intended to kill the bill, and the other intended to perfect it as far as the mover is capable of doing so. I have not offered a single amendment to this bill which had for its object the loading down of the bill, or in other words, to make it so objectionable that even its friends would not vote for it. I know there is a determination to carry it through without amendment, and I know that it is the wish of the distinguished Senator who has it in charge that it shall pass this body without amendment, for he appealed to his supporters yesterday evening to vote down all amendments and take the bill as it has been recommended by the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST,] and it was adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That must have been a very strong amendment when it obtained the vote of the Senator from Illinois, and I am glad that it was adopted, because it was a highly meritorious one. But, sir, I supposed that this bill was brought forth for the purpose of relieving the Supreme Court, and I did not imagine that one of its purposes was to interfere with the existing jurisdiction of the courts of original authority in the Union. The Senator from Illinois yesterday evening, in speaking against my amendment went on to say that during his judicial life he was never called upon in his high capacity as a supreme judge to pass upon any of the cases of inferior jurisdiction, the cases which are affected by the amendment I now propose. I can understand that. He presided over a circuit in the interior of the country, far away from the seaboard, where it was not likely that matters of admiralty or maritime jurisdiction should be found, and it is possible that he had with him on the bench a district judge, indeed I know he had, of such wide reputation, such elevated talents and acquirements, that appeals in small cases were never thought of from him.

But what was there in the argument of the honorable Senator against the wisdom of adopting my amendment? If it was true, as he stated, that it was not customary for cases such as are provided for in this amendment to arise in great numbers, what objection can there be to incorporating this amendment into the bill? What objection can there be to retaining the present appellate authority existing under the law, from the district to the circuit court of the United States, in all cases over $50 and under $500? If those cases are not numerous or embarrassing; if they will not affect very materially the business or the time of the court, why should they be stricken from the law? Why should appellate jurisdiction be denied to this class of suitors, poor men who are not able ever to see the Supreme Court of the United States, who may regard it as a privilege to be able to appeal from some of our district judges down South, as well as at the North, to the circuit judge, or even to a supreme judge who may occasionally, like the visit of an angel, come among us to shed a little eminent judicial light? It is possible, I say, that some man whose fortune is not large and whose property does not extend to millions under railroad charters, may desire to appeal from the district to the circuit court, and to have an humble case even brought under the notice of one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, even though the sum involved may not exceed $500.

Why should that be denied him? I say if there is no pressing exigency; if, according to the argument of the Senator from Illinois, this class of cases is not large, why should we take away this jurisdiction unless the bill is intended to be leveled against the class of people whom alone it affects? But if the number of these causes is not large, I say allow this authority to prevail as we now find it, because I assure the Senator that these provisions did not find their way into the Revised Statutes by mere accident; they were put there by design, and they have subserved, according to my own observation, a very useful purpose in days gone by. This jurisdiction is very important to the class of people it is intended to benefit, and it will appear strange to them that while a person who is able to embark in a lawsuit which involves $10,000 can appeal to two high courts, the right of the man who can only engage in a $500 controversy is taken away in the bill which gives two appeals to the other.

Now, sir, what is the whole scheme of this measure? To create nine appellate courts to be made up of district judges and circuit judges. Sir, I am of the opinion, notwithstanding the opinion of other lawyers to the contrary, that when this grand frame of Government was devised by the fathers of the Constitution, it never was intended by them that any appellate power should be exercised outside of the Supreme Court of the United States. I know that there are opinions and arguments to the contrary. I know very well that our grand organic law has been refined away by construction from time to time until very little of its original spirit is left; but I speak in the spirit of the men who framed it, of the intentions of the great law-givers who met at Philadelphia in 1787, when I say that they never contemplated but one Supreme Court of appeal under our judicial system, and that every cause of consequence and of importance arising out of our judicial system was intended to be passed upon by that high court alone. This was in keeping with the genius and the wants of the country, and such a thing as a diversity of appellate tribunals exercising co-ordinate and coequal powers among the several circuits of this country never entered into the brain of any of the men who framed our organic law.

And how is this thing going to work? It is a novelty in its way. It may be said that the Constitution is imperfect. If that be true, we cannot amend it by act of Congress. What was it that gave rise to our Constitution? It was the discordance and conflicts in our laws, want of uniformity, the irregularity which distinguished the rules and regulations of the respective States in regard to subjects that ought to be controlled by uniform authority. It was the want of some steady, undeviating rule with respect to the regulation of commerce that gave rise to our present Constitution; and when it was brought into life it was expected that everything that had the force of law, whether emanating from the Legislature or from the highest court in the land, would have such uniformity of authority and operation that it would have the same effect in one State as it did in another; that it would be the same throughout the entire Union.

How is it going to be with this new judicial system? Here are nine courts of appeal to be established by this bill, and one Supreme Court sitting in Washington. In all cases under $10,000 the judgments of these nine courts are to be absolutely conclusive. They are not courts of original jurisdiction, mark you, like the circuit or district court as at present organized, whose judgments in an ordinary controversy between man and man amount to nothing beyond the particular case or controversy that happens to be before it at the particular time. The judgment of a circuit court of the United States or of a district court of the United States at present amounts to nothing outside of the particular cause which it has before it. It is not the law of the district; it is not the law of the land; it amounts to no settled rule of property; it establishes nothing but the right of the particular party in the particular litigation. It is otherwise with respect to a judgment of our highest court; it establishes principles that are uniform and coextensive with the Union; its opinions are accepted as the law of the land, and they are respected by every court within the Federal jurisdiction as such.

But how will it be with these appellate tribunals proposed to be created in the nine circuits for the first time? They are not courts of original jurisdiction; they are not courts that will act as the circuit and district courts act now. They are to settle principles, to fix rules of property, to prescribe rules of decision that will affect the interests of the masses living within each one of these judicial circuits in all cases where the sum in controversy is under $10,000.

I said that if the framers of the Constitution had one thing in view beyond another it was uniformity in the force of the laws that were to be enacted by the Congress of the United States, and by the highest judicial tribunal of the Union. Is it to be supposed that the judgments and decisions of these nine courts will be uniform throughout the Union? Is it possible that any two of them will ever agree upon any particular question that may come up before them? And here you have nine appellate courts sitting under the same authority, under the same Government, administering the same laws to persons entitled to the same privileges, establishing different rights, announcing different principles, bringing the whole system of the judiciary into confusion. The revenue laws, the bank laws, the bankrupt law if we shall have one, every Federal statute that gives a right or creates a liability is to be construed and expounded by these nine appellate courts, and each for itself within each of the circuits.

That you are going to have. You will have the citizens living in the fifth circuit under the decisions of the court there with one rule of property acknowledged by one court of appeal, and the citizens in another circuit, also living within the Union, with a different rule. Is that calculated to produce harmony? If the man in Florida has not the same rights, respected in the same way, in the courts of the Union there, that the citizen of Illinois has, it will naturally produce dissatisfaction.

The decisions of these appellate courts will constitute rules of property which will enter into the purchase and sales of all kinds of estates. They will have to be consulted just as the decisions of the higher courts in the State are when transfers of property are made. Their operation and effect will be like that of a Federal statute, except that there will be no uniformity about them, and the law of one circuit will not be the law of another, although the authority from which they emanate is the same.

Mr. President, I know very well that the docket of the Supreme Court has been loaded down for some years, and, as I said in the opening remarks which I addressed to the Senate when I commenced this debate, something ought to be done, if possible, to relieve that court from the pressure resting upon it; but I do not think the step has been taken in the right way to accomplish that end. We have been going on for years increasing by degrees the jurisdiction of the Federal courts without necessity. All that a citizen of a State need do now, in order to get Federal jurisdiction even against another citizen of the same State, is to make affidavit that he cannot get justice, on certain grounds, in the State courts, and he can remove his controversy into the Federal tribunals.

Sir, it is a remarkable fact that, while much has been said here regarding the great increase in the business of the Federal courts of late years, and as it has been alleged in consequence of the increase of population and of business, no such increase has been perceived in the business of the State tribunals. Why has the number of cases increased so greatly in the Federal courts, while in the State courts, that are within the jurisdiction of the same country, no such increase is perceptible? It is not owing to any increase in the population or in the business of the country, but it is because this Government has been departing day by day from the traditions of the fathers; it is because the courts of the United States have been by degrees usurping powers that the framers of the Constitution never intended they should exercise, and they have gradually almost absorbed the entire jurisdiction in judicial matters throughout the Union.

And now instead of attempting to cut down that jurisdiction, instead of beginning at the right end and bringing back this authority to the confines that originally bounded it, we are asked to pervert the entire scheme of the fathers of the Constitution and undertake to establish nine appellate courts instead of one. Sir, I want to stand by the Constitution as near as possible as it came from the hands of the fathers; and if it is possible to find a remedy for existing difficulties by conforming to the original scheme of the framers of the Constitution, I want to adopt that remedy, and I think it can be done. I do not want any nine appellate courts created throughout the Union that will turn out annually numbers of discordant opinions to unsettle everything throughout the land. I want "one supreme court," whose judgments upon all matters of an appellate character shall be uniform throughout the Union in everything that is worthy to be appealed; and I do not want a supreme court or a court of appeals in my circuit made up of the odds and ends of the bench below, circuit and district judges massed together, as is proposed by this bill.

I do not care who recommends this system, whether it be the Bar Association of New York or any other persons; I think it will prove to be unwise, and instead of affording a remedy for the evil complained of it will increase it. I do not think that the business of the Supreme Court will be diminished by this bill in this way.

Now, sir, there are two parties usually to a cause in every court. What do they represent? The one represents the debtor and the other the creditor class. There is always somebody in a court after money, for that is the great object of litigation after all, and there is always somebody before a court out of whom money is to be made to be affected by its judgment.

It has been stated in this debate that the country has outgrown our judicial system; and we have had it stated here that only an insignificant number of cases were before the Supreme Court at the time of its early organization, and that they did not perceptibly increase for years, but that latterly they have become overwhelming and numerous. All this is true. This applies to the original jurisdiction of the circuit court. The original judiciary act was adopted in 1789. The framers of the Constitution were a wise body of men, and some of them participated in the framing of the judiciary act of 1789. Mr. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, I think, was its author. A better lawyer never lived in this country. They made all final judgments and decrees of the circuit court in which the sum involved was $2,000 appealable to the Supreme Court of the United States, and they put the limit of $500 upon controversies between citizens of the respective States allowed to be brought in the circuit court, which has continued to the present day.

No citizen can sue another in a court of the United States unless the sum in controversy exceeds $500. That is the precise sum fixed by the judiciary act of 1789 in behalf of the creditor against the debtor, for generally when a suit is brought in the courts of the United States, or in any other courts, it is by a creditor against a debtor. No creditor can institute a suit at common law in any court of the United States against his debtor unless the sum involved, exclusive of costs, exceeds $500. The law which fixed that limit gave to the debtor the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in cases where the sum in controversy, exclusive of costs, exceeded $2,000. This was supposed to be a reasonable arrangement according to the condition of the country at that time. While Congress has gone on and added to the amount necessary to get jurisdiction by appeal in the Supreme Court, which as a general thing has been in favor of the creditor and against the debtor, it has never once thought of modifying or changing in the least the conditions upon which jurisdiction shall be taken in the circuit court in the first instance.

If the condition of the country has so changed as to require $10,000 to be the proper limit in cases of controvery of which the Supreme Court shall take cognizance, is it not proper to look at the other end of the line and see if some change that would improve our system might not be made there? Suppose Congress should require that before any suit was instituted in the Federal courts by the citizen of one State against the citizen of another, the sum in controvery should be $3,000; would there be any great hardship in that? And while you are changing the jurisdiction all around on one side of the line, you never think of making any change on the other. Would it not be reasonable to put a limit in accordance with the changed condition of the country different from what we find in the act of 1789 upon the jurisdiction of the circuit court in civil cases?

Why should we adhere implicitly to the $500 prescribed by the judiciary act of 1789! If the condition of the country is changed so greatly as to make change in this system necessary in order to enable the appellate court to discharge intelligently its high duties, why not begin at the other end and not leave it all to be done at one end? You deprive a debtor, or a party who may be called upon to pay, of the right of going to the Supreme Court unless he has a sum involved amounting to $10,000, while you permit any man who has a claim against another to sue in the circuit court of the United States in any of the States of this Union if his demand amounts to $500.

I have said that the business of the State courts has not increased in proportion to the business in the Federal courts, and it is because the Constitution has been abandoned; it is because the Federal judicial system has been gradually absorbing to itself the rights, powers, and duties of the local courts, a thing that never was thought of in the early history of the Government. Now, sir, the foreign suitor has all the remedies open to him in the State courts that the citizen of the State has, and I never thought there was so much hardship after all in these cases as some people have tried to impress upon us, because every citizen of the United States can go into the State tribunals to-day and obtain justice there just as a citizen of the State can, and those courts have concurrent jurisdiction in every controversy that is possible to be brought into a Federal court; and still one would be led to believe from the arguments we have heard here that there was only one forum open to these litigants, and that if they did not have the way made clear and plain for them into the Federal courts, they could have no justice at all!

Sir, if a suitor with his eyes open goes into a tribunal where he knows delay must follow, whom has he to blame? If a suitor wants to wait three years or five years before his controversy is ended, when he has a choice of a tribunal that will decide it in one year, where does the fault lie? I believe, as a general thing, that the judges of the respective State courts are equal in every respect to the judges of the Federal courts, and, inasmuch as they have to draw their juries from the same source, they can have administered to them in those courts justice as impartially and as fairly and far more speedily than in the other tribunals. But, sir, of recent years a false sentiment has been built up against the local tribunals of the State; a prejudice has been created in the minds of people living beyond the confines of a particular State that justice cannot be obtained in its tribunals against citizens of that State.

I have not had as extensive a practice as many gentlemen here, but I am free to say that the result of my observation has been that justice has been as fairly, as impartially, and far more speedily administered in the courts of the States than it has been in the courts of the Union. Why not then restrict jurisdiction in the circuit courts to some extent? The State courts are open to all the citizens of the Union. Is not the supreme court of Massachusetts, of New York, of any of the States, North and South, to-day just as competent and impartial in the administration of justice as the courts of the United States?

The Senator from Mississippi awhile ago referred to the question of costs. I asked him if he could tell me what was the largest sum in the way of costs and allowances that he ever knew to be allowed in the State of Mississippi. He said he could not tell. I had a case in the Supreme Court the other day that came up from the district court in my State on a cost bill, an allowance bill from the Federal court, that shows how expensive litigation is. The court allowed a litigant, outside of the property involved, $95,000 for costs and charges—a Federal court allowed $95,000 for costs and charges, allowed the plaintiff in the suit a salary for years and clerk hire to watch the property upon which he had a lien!

Why, sir, if such a thing had been allowed in a State tribunal the public opinion standing behind would not have tolerated it; but we know that there is little or no responsibility behind these Federal courts. If there is one thing which gives to a citizen more security for his rights than another in matters of this kind, it is the publicity and notoriety attending the deliberations and judgments of the Supreme Court of the United States. I would rather wait three years there in an important case for its judgment than to go down on the circuit and wait to get a judgment in one year. I do not care whom you put on the circuit bench, and I say that the whole tendency of this bill and of the legislation of late years has been to remove the higher branches of the judiciary away from the people, and it was well said the other day that this is a Government of the people; and, while some limit must be fixed in order to regulate the question of jurisdiction, it ought not to be so high as to preclude the possibility of the ordinary citizen ever reaching the highest court of his country. Ten thousand dollars would be nothing to a certain class of men in the United States at the present time, but it is high enough to exclude from the Supreme Court of the United States the great body of the American people. The majority of the people of this country to-day cannot command $10,000 in a lawsuit, and the effect of this sum as a limit upon the jurisdiction will be to prevent every ordinary citizen throughout the land from being able to enter that tribunal whose judges are paid by his sweat and blood.

Somebody said something the other day about sentiment; I think it was the Senator from Kansas not now in his seat; but the world is governed by sentiment; and if in a popular government like this you erect any establishment so high as to be beyond the touch of the people the popular inclination will be to tear it down. I am not using this argument in the sense of a demagogue, but I am speaking as becomes one who has no feigned attachment for the institutions of the country under which he lives. Look at the progress of opinion in Great Britain and look how different the House of Lords is regarded to-day from what it was one hundred years ago. Every year it becomes more and more unpopular with the masses, and the tendency of opinion there is to abolish it and to concentrate all governmental authority in the great body which represents the bone and sinew of the state. So I say in endeavoring to fix jurisdictions under a popular system they ought to be brought down as near as possible to the level of the wants of the entire community, for there will be found men to point out the distinctions and to comment upon them before those who will not be so able to discriminate as some of us who are here.

I would reform the Supreme Court, I would add to its members if I could not add to its efficiency, and I would put it in a condition that would leave it open to all men alike. I would not have one jurisdiction for one class of men and another for another. The moment you create these intermediate tribunals you will have pointed out to you the distinction which their organization suggests. They will be pointed to as tribunals into which one class of men may go while another may go beyond them, whereas if they did not exist at all and the right was uniform and common there would be no complaint. But when you say that one class of people with controversies amounting to $10,000 shall have their rights settled in one set of tribunals and another class of men whose property is worth more than $10,000 shall have access to a higher and a greater tribunal, you suggest an inequality that will be made a foundation of jealousy and complaint.

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois said I criticised the bill from beginning to end. If I have done so it has been in a generous spirit, for if I believed that it would result in good to the country I would go as far as he in advocating its passage; and in bringing forth the amendments that I have, I have sought to make it as perfect as in my humble judgment it ought to be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, before the Senate votes on this amendment of the Senator from Florida, I desire to state very briefly what I conceive to be the question at issue. I have heretofore adverted to the same general topics but not in reference to the amendment now proposed. I have stated that the act of 1789, known as the judiciary act, following the Constitution, provided:

> That final decrees and judgments in civil actions in a district court, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of $50, exclusive of costs, may be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed, in a circuit court holden in the same district upon a writ of error whereto shall be annexed and returned therewith at the day and place therein mentioned an authenticated transcript of the record, an assignment of errors, and prayer for reversal, with a citation to the adverse party signed by the judge of such district court or a justice of the Supreme Court, the adverse party having at least twenty days' notice.

That right has stood upon the statute-book without any upward limitation, the downward limitation being $50, since 1789, and has always been considered until recently, I believe, a valuable right secured to the people. This bill proposes to cut off the right to a writ of error in all civil causes at common law unless the amount in controversy exceeds $500. The Senator from Florida proposes to retain in favor of the people the right to a writ of error in causes at common law, as they are termed, from the district to the circuit court in sums not less than $50 nor exceeding $500. The bill that is proposed to the Senate leaves that entire area between $500 and $50 entirely unprovided for except that it repeals all existing rights to writs of error or appeals in sums lying between those figures. I have inquired for a reason, and in vain, as we all inquire in vain for any reason in reference to the proposed measure before the Senate, why this right should be taken from the people? Why this right which was contemporaneous with the foundation of the Government should be taken from the people? What can be the basis of this repeal unless its practice has been found to be entirely unnecessary? Who can affirm, who has affirmed upon his personal experience or upon his knowledge of the history of the jurisprudence of this country, that this has not been always a valuable right? Here is a field of jurisdiction for the trial of causes in small amounts in the Federal courts which is entirely obliterated by this bill, and intentionally so. There can be no question of the intention, there can be no question as to the effect of this second section.

What is included in that? Suits for conspiracies under the civil-rights law. There may be twenty men sued for the same conspiracy, and if there is a judgment of $500 against each of them in the district courts of the United States, none of them can, under this bill, have any appeal to any other court whatever. What else is included? All accounts and demands in favor of non-residents and non-resident corporations between the sums of $50 and $500 are included in this second section, which takes away the right of writ of error and the right of appeal. What else is included? All sums that national banks may be sued for, and all sums that may be sued for by national banks in the States between the sums of $50 and $500.

No right of appeal or writ of error is to be allowed if this bill passes in any of the cases that I have mentioned to any court whatsoever. The district judge must pronounce his decision, and the man must submit to it without appeal. The court in the first instance tries it finally, in opposition to the entire spirit of the whole jurisprudence of the United States. The people must submit to it because the Congress of the United States desires to break down a right that has existed since 1789.

That the honorable Senator from Illinois calls a part of the scheme of this bill. Well, sir, if it is a part of the scheme it is part of a very bad scheme and a very unnecessary part of a bad scheme. The Senator from Florida proposes to amend this scheme by retaining in favor of the people a right which they have so long enjoyed. The Senator from Illinois thinks that if that proviso was put to the second section it might mar the harmony of the scheme. And the Senator, in reply to a remark made on the floor by one of the Senators who was discussing the subject—I forget now precisely who it was—said, "Ah, that is the poor man's argument." Yes, sir, that is "the poor man's argument" and the poor man's plea, and it must be remembered that the Government of the United States in its judicial establishment touches poor men as well as rich. If it touches the people alike it is bound to touch a much larger number of poor men than of rich, for in the midst of all our vaunted and boasted prosperity there are still millions more of the poor than of the rich in this country. A man is to be twitted or censured in the Senate for venturing to avow that he is in favor of supporting existing rights in favor of men who are called poor men. We are to be denounced as demagogues for doing it. Sir, I should welcome the title of demagogue in the advocacy of such a cause far sooner than I would that of being the slave of a plutocracy. I much prefer that rather than to break down these rights merely because the money interests of the country demand that they should be broken down.

The honorable Senator from Illinois said that he was not the author of this bill, and that relieves me from great embarrassment in the argument, for I confess that I have been under embarrassment, and I have no doubt every Senator on this floor has felt the same embarrassment in any attempt to criticise or vote against any measure of a judicial nature which the honorable Senator may bring forward; but I have observed that this bill has been criticised by votes of the colleagues of the Senator on the Judiciary Committee. The honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] has voted time and again for amendments that he thought would improve this bill and would not mar "the scheme," being a friend of the bill in the enlarged sense, in the sense of its being "a scheme." The Senator from Arkansas has been willing to vote for amendments to this bill, and who will deny that he is a distinguished member of the Judiciary Committee? The honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] when he left his seat in the Senate a few days ago, gave me in charge, an amendment which he requested me to ask the Senate to make to this bill, which would seriously mar "the scheme," and yet it would very greatly improve the measure.

What is to be said, then, of the unity of the Judiciary Committee upon this bill? The honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] the chairman of that committee, told me in his seat that he was opposed to the bill out and out.

There are, then, three members of that committee who are willing to see some part of this "scheme" altered with a view to its improvement. Three of them are absent, the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] and the ex-Senator from Colorado, (Mr. Teller.) They are not here to express their opinion. So that only a bare majority, a bare quorum of that committee, as far as we have heard, are content to take this bill and swallow it whole without amendment and without any criticism upon it. Sir, this bill does not come from the Judiciary Committee of the Senate with that unanimity and that support through all of its features which seems to have been claimed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] when he insists that the Senate should yield its opinion to the Judiciary Committee upon this question.

The honorable Senator, with a view of getting some support for his bill, had read yesterday a telegram from the Bar Association of New York in which they recommended to Congress the passage of this bill. I am not surprised at that, but I am a little surprised that no bar association in the West or the South has ever been solicited to give an opinion on this measure.

I am not surprised at this when I look into "the scheme" of this bill, for it is a bill in the interest of the creditor class and against the debtor; it is a bill in favor of the concentrated power of commercial supremacy in the Eastern States, instead of the people in the South and the West who live in the agricultural districts; it is a bill in the interest of capitalists against the common poor people; it is a bill which robs the people of the rights which have existed since 1789 under the law of this country to an appeal from the court of first instance to the circuit court in all sums between fifty and five hundred dollars, and at the same time it excludes them from the Supreme Court of the United States unless the controversies exceed the sum of $10,000. You deprive them of all power of appeal to the Supreme Court by fixing the amount which shall give that court jurisdiction, and then as the honorable Senator from Florida says, at the other end of "the scheme," you cut them off from all right of appeal to any court whatever if the sum is below the amount of $500.

The national banks in the State of Alabama can do what we know they do continually—exact usury from the people almost at pleasure. They can have their notes made when they choose, in sums under $500; they can sue in the Federal courts citizens of the very State in which they exist; and we are left at the mercy of the judge to say whether or not we shall have an appeal from his decisions in favor of these Federal pets. No; we are not even left at his mercy, because the bill of the honorable Senator from Illinois, or the bill of the New York Bar Association, or of Judge Drummond, or whoever it was that invented this "scheme," cuts us off from all right of appeal unless the sum amounts to $500.

And because a Senator attempts to amend this bill by preserving the rights of the people he is charged with making an obstruction to the bill and trying to destroy the entire "scheme," and the question is asked him, "Why do you not come out and vote against the whole bill, instead of attempting to amend this 'scheme,' which, if you amend it at all, you destroy its beauty and its harmony?" It is a bill which is conducted more in hostility to the men who oppose it on this floor than any bill that I have ever seen urged in the Senate. No Senator here will deny that this is one of the most important measures that ever came before the Senate of the United States; and yet when we attempt to amend it, when we challenge it upon grounds of constitutionality, we are charged with proposing amendments merely for the purpose of defacing or defeating a splendid "scheme." It has not been our fault that we have been compelled to meet this bill inch by inch in trying to expose before the world its infirmities and its imperfections; but, sir, it will be our fault if we yield the floor until these are fully known.

It is bruited about on this floor by men in high authority that the President of the United States has committed himself, that if this bill is passed, quite a number of Democrats will be found to comprise the membership of these new courts. Sir, I spurn overtures like that. I do not vote for such a measure to get Democrats in power. My vote is given here with a conscientious reference to my duty to my country, to my people, and only with reference to them. It matters little to the people of Alabama, who comprise 1,250,000 population, whether a man put on the bench is a Democrat or a Republican; it matters but little to those people who is put there; but it matters much if rights which have existed in their favor under the law are taken away from them and they are to be exposed to the will and pleasure of the district courts of the United States without the remedy of appeal from their decision. I therefore stand by the people, poor, if you please to call them such; it makes no difference to me—demagogue if you choose to call me for that; it makes no difference to me; and I shall walk out of the Senate after this bill is passed with a consciousness that I am not bound to a plutocracy of this country, neither have I been seduced by appeals to my party fealty with the idea that I could get some Democrat on the bench if I would vote for this bill. I spurn overtures like that. Let the bill stand on its merits.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to have a clear understanding with the Senator from Alabama, and I think it is for the interest of pure legislation that we should understand the fact. The Senator says, in substance, that it is openly avowed here upon this floor that the President of the United States has pledged himself to appoint a number of Democrats on this court if this bill shall pass.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not say "openly avowed;" I said "bruited about on the floor." Perhaps I should better have said "whispered."

Mr. DAWES. That does not make it any better.

Mr. INGALLS. I would suggest that all allusions to the Executive in connection with pending legislation, under parliamentary practice, are wholly out of order and in violation of precedent and of decency.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Kansas is so perfect a judge of decency in this Senate, and is such a model of honor himself, and of purity and dignity and character, that I take a reprimand from him with due submission.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me a moment.

Mr. MORGAN. I know what my rights are in speaking about the President or any one else, as a member of the Senate. I did not say the President of the United States had made any such statement. What I said was this, that it had been bruited upon this floor that such promises had been made.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not intend to be pushed into a corner about this business, but if the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to know upon what authority I speak, if he will come to my desk I will tell him.

Mr. DAWES. I did not criticise the Senator's violation of any rule——

Mr. MORGAN. I know of what I speak.

Mr. DAWES. But it is due to the Senator, and it is due to the Senator's associates upon this floor who are called upon to vote one way or the other upon this bill, that the Senator should make clear and undoubted any statement of so serious a character as that.

Mr. BUTLER. Why, Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa said yesterday, in his remarks in open Senate, that he did not believe all these judges would be appointed from one political party.

Mr. DAWES. That is quite a different thing from what has been said by the Senator from Alabama. If what the Senator from Alabama has stated is true, those who have been the organs of any negotiation of that kind, and those who have been parties to it, deserve to be impeached by this tribunal, and the Senator from Alabama, if he has any reliable information of that character, is bound to make it public and to call to account those who have undertaken any such thing.

Mr. MORGAN. I have made public my statement, which the stenographer has taken down, which was that it was bruited about on this floor that, in the event of the passage of this bill, a number of Democrats would be appointed upon the bench.

Mr. DAWES. I understood the Senator to say that it was bruited about upon this floor that the President had given assurances that such would be done.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not say "assurances."

Mr. DAWES. "By high authority upon this floor."

Mr. MORGAN. Well, it is high authority.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator say that he has any authority for the statement that the President has given any assurances that in the event this bill shall pass certain men of any character whatever will be appointed upon the bench?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not stated that the President had given any assurances. I said it was bruited about on this floor that he had stated or had given assurances that Democrats would be appointed.

Mr. DAWES. So I understood the Senator. I do not see that the Senator changes his original statement. I think it grows in gravity every time the Senator repeats it. I do not think the Senator can fail to see that he brings a grave charge against the purity of the Executive and the purity of legislation in this Chamber.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is more than half willing that I shall make such a charge, but I decline the honor. I think he would like to provoke me into bringing such an accusation against the President of the United States, and I have no doubt he would to some extent enjoy it; still I will not do it.

Mr. DAWES. I do not quite hear the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. I prefer to proceed with my remarks without further interruption from the honorable Senator who desires to put me under cross-examination as to a matter that I have not put myself on the stand as a witness about.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator indulge me a moment? I have no desire——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield further?

Mr. MORGAN. It depends entirely upon the inquiry which the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to indulge in. I want to know what that is before I indulge him.

Mr. DAWES. It is simply in good faith to ask the Senator from Alabama if he does not think it due to his own character and to the character of Senators and the Executive that he should not have indulged in such an insinuation as he has made unless he had such ground for it that he was willing to make public.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not indulged in any insinuation about this matter. I believed I had such ground for it as justified me in making use of the expression of which I have made use, and I think I am quite as competent a guardian of my own character as the Senator from Massachusetts is of his or of mine either. What I have said is upon the record and will remain there, and that without alteration. I have nothing to retract of what I have said about this subject, and I reaffirm it, that an influence here pervades this body directed to the proposition that if this bill shall pass a fair number of Democrats will be appointed to this bench, and I say that so far as I am concerned I am not under the control of such an influence as that; that is no argument to me for the passage of this bill.

I should be gratified to see Democrats upon the bench; at the same time I would never vote to make eighteen judges of the circuit court of the United States because I expected some of them to be Democrats, unless I found that the necessities of the country required such a number as that. It is too serious a matter for us to undertake to create eighteen judges for life with a salary of $6,000 per annum each, which cannot be reduced during the term they are in office, merely upon the consideration that some of them may be Democrats. There must be better reasons than that shown if I am expected to support the bill. I desire to keep the people of Alabama, whom I have the honor in part to represent on this floor, out of the reach of judges that I have demonstrated here ought not to have the power to pass upon sums between $50 and $500 without appeal from their decisions. That is the precise point I make upon the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

I did not want the Senate to misunderstand the amendment, I did not want them to misunderstand the law, when they were voting upon it, nor did I want the country to fail to understand that if the amendment of the Senator from Florida is defeated a right is taken away which has existed since 1789, which is a valuable right; if not to a rich man, it is to a poor man. It will not mar this bill, it will not destroy the "scheme," it will not inflict any injury upon any person to preserve in this bill by the proviso which the honorable Senator from Florida proposes to preserve all the rights that now exist in behalf of people as to appeals and writs of error to the circuit courts of the United States. Why, then, strike it out when sums between $50 and $500 are involved?

I have remarked before that the Bar Association of New York had been consulted about this measure, but no bar association in the South or the West has ever been consulted, so far as I know. The opinion of the debtor classes of this country is not to be taken on this question. It seems that some suspicion rests not only upon them, but upon all the States that they occupy.

How does it happen that we are debtor classes? It happens from the very nature of the commerce of the country. New York does more trade in one year than all the other cities of the United States put together, and that, too, with all the rural populations of the United States extending through to the Pacific coast. There is not a hamlet in the United States which has not more or less direct trade communication with New York. Of all the places on this continent New York is most continuously and most largely the creditor community. They have the choice of tribunals. They can go into the State courts, or they can go into the Federal courts. If they go into the State courts with a demand within the jurisdiction of those courts, they have the right of appeal to the State supreme court if they choose; and if they choose to go into the Federal courts under this bill, and the sum is less than $500 and over $50, the defendants have no right of appeal at all.

I claim that when you are taking away jurisdiction from the State courts, as this bill evidently is intended to do, and when you are conferring it upon the Federal courts, it is your duty to preserve such rights of appeal, at least, as you can preserve without marring the beauty of this "scheme." The bill will bear at least that much burden. This bill would have been voted for by many men on this side of the Chamber who cannot now get their consent to vote for it, if the Judiciary Committee, by its representatives on this floor, had shown the slightest degree of indulgence to opposing opinions on these matters. True it is we may not have the right to set up our opinions against gentlemen of such great learning as the members of that committee; but still, in our humble way, we think we have the right of judgment upon every measure brought here. No argument we can make, no suggestion we can bring forward, is met with anything else than silent contempt on the other side of the Chamber, and I infer that the reason for it is that you are going to get the eighteen judges.

In the further progress of this question, I shall feel it to be my duty, if some other Senator does not feel it to be his duty, to bring in a motion to recommit the bill. It is not a perfect bill, it is not a consistent bill. It has some features in it which are contradictory in themselves, and some which are entirely superfluous.

If the plan of the bill should be adopted that we are to have nine courts of appeal in the United States, it will be found that the time for holding these courts necessarily will take from the circuit and district bench of the United States those men who are required in nisi prius causes, and that for a long period of time, so that we really weaken the power of the judges to try causes at nisi prius by giving them this extended power of appeal reaching up to $10,000. It will be found on examination, I think, that the committee have paid no attention to this matter. It will be found that while this bill proposes to carry justice home to the doors of the people, they have omitted to take it to the capitals of the respective States in the different circuits.

There are other clauses in this bill which will yet be pointed out. I hope the Senate will take it into serious consideration whether the welfare of the country in this important matter does not require that the Judiciary Committee shall take this bill with the other projects that are submitted to the Senate and which are before it now and, with the further aid of the observations made in debate here, mature a bill and bring it in. We have plenty of time for that. We had no difficulty in reforming and passing a Chinese bill through both Houses after the President had vetoed one such measure. It was the work of a very few days before we had a bill back here to meet the necessities of that occasion. The reason for that was that there was the spur and stimulus of a political question beneath that bill.

The Judiciary Committee can take this bill with the suggestions which have been made, and remedy the difficulties which have invited already votes on the part of members of that committee against various of its provisions. I do not know whether these Senators will vote against the bill finally or not, but they have attempted by their votes here to purge it of difficulties which are patent upon the face of the bill; and I must be excused if I co-operate with them and concur with them also in opinion about the impropriety of some of the provisions of this proposed law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired generally with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who is absent from the city. I do not know how he would vote if he were here, but I withhold my vote. I should vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER.]

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BUTLER, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I observe that other Senators are announcing their pairs. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] upon the bill, but perhaps I had better not vote upon this question. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 29; as follows:

Managers on the part of the Senate.
THOS. RYAN,
L. B. CASWELL,
BENJAMIN LE FEVRE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to have the ear of the Senator in charge of the bill for a moment. I notice several amounts, some of them large, have been stricken out and others substituted. I ask the Senator whether the appropriations have been increased or decreased as a whole since the bill left the Senate?

Mr. DAWES. The appropriations have been considerably diminished from what they were when the bill left the Senate; they have been diminished by the sum of $255,200. I submit the following list of reductions in Senate amendments made in conference:

Salary of agent at White Earth agency	$200
Pay of interpreters	5,000
Traveling and other expenses of inspector of Indian schools	500
One special agent and traveling expenses	3,500
Poncas, subsistence, &c	5,000
Sioux of different tribes, subsistence, annuity, goods, &c	75,000
Arapahoes, Cheyennes, &c., subsistence	50,000
Tonkawas at Fort Griffin, Texas, support	1,000
Special police to prevent sale of liquor	5,000
Seminole Indians, Florida, schools, seeds, &c	5,000
Education of Indian children west of the Mississippi	100,000
School building at Cœur d'Alène Indian reservation	5,000
Total reduction in conference	255,200
Total of Senate amendments	543,800
Total reductions made in conference	255,200
Amount agreed to in conference	288,600

Total of bill as agreed to, $5,217,803.91, which exceeds appropriations for 1882, including deficiencies already provided for, $46,937.11.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It appears to me also that some offices have been created, or that money has been appropriated to pay certain officers. Have there been any new offices created by the conference committee?

Mr. DAWES. None at all. There have been no additions by the conference committee; they have all been reductions of what the Senate put in, to the amount I have stated.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I notice that certain offices are to be filled, and so much money is appropriated to pay them.

Mr. DAWES. The conference committee have created no new offices.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. They are such as were agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, they were agreed to by the Senate. The conference committee have created no new office and appropriated no money for payment to any new officer.

The report was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit herewith for the consideration of Congress a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a copy of a letter from the governor of Arizona, in which he requests that an appropriation of $2,000 be made for the contingent expenses of the Territory for the next fiscal year.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 11, 1882.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 5664) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

Mr. GEORGE. I move to add the following as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. —. That any defendant in a suit at law or equity in any court of the United States may plead or except to the jurisdiction of the court at the same time that he pleads or answers to the merits; and if said plea or exception be overruled or decided against him, he shall, nevertheless, be entitled to defend on the merits as if said plea had not been filed nor said exception taken.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. I move to add the following as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. —. That no court of the United States shall have any jurisdiction of a suit in equity or action at law when such jurisdiction depends alone upon the fact that a controversy exists therein between citizens of different States, or citizens of the same State claiming grants from different States, or between a State and citizens of another State, if one of the parties to such controversy, either as plaintiff or defendant, be a corporation created by the laws of one or more of the States; nor shall such corporation sue or be liable to be sued in any of such courts, in virtue of the citizenship of any of its members.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have taken no part in the discussion of this bill, and I desire only now in a dozen words to state the reasons for my vote.

I have listened with great pleasure and profit for two weeks to the able and learned arguments of the lawyers of the Senate upon this question, and my mind has been forced to the conclusion that we had better proceed no further in this business of making Federal courts for the United States. I have favored all the amendments, because I thought in some degree they would modify the bill itself, but with or without any or all of the amendments proposed I should be against the bill upon principle. I am against it because it multiplies offices and salaries, it increases the judges, the clerks, the marshals, and the tipstaves of the courts of the country.

I am satisfied, however, that the bill is going to pass, from the test votes we have had in the voting down of every amendment. Indeed, it seems to have been considered by the gentlemen upon the opposite side to be an impertinence on this side to offer an amendment to the bill. My only hope for defeating this measure is in the patriotism and good sense of the popular branch of Congress.

I regard this bill as fraught with more mischief to the country than any measure which has been before Congress during the time that I have had the honor of a seat in the Senate.

If the Federal courts are overwhelmed with business, if their dockets are piled up with causes which it is impossible for them to decide in the course of years, what is the reason of it? It is because their jurisdiction has been increased by the Legislature of the nation and the usurpations of the courts themselves. Take away from them the jurisdiction improperly given by acts of Congress and usurped by the judges themselves, and bring the courts back to the jurisdiction they had in ante bellum times, and the circuit courts, the district courts, and the Supreme Court of the United States will have ample opportunity to decide all the causes that come before them.

I remember in my own State before the war when old Tom Monroe used to call his court at Frankfort and hardly anybody knew that it was in session. It met about twice a year and entered two or three orders on the minutes, and the fact is the people of the State did not know of it. Nobody except the lawyers themselves knew that we had a Federal court there.

I should like to see the happy, good old days brought back again to the country when the United States courts had a jurisdiction confined exclusively to the cases contemplated by the Constitution. If that does not do, amend the Constitution itself, and take away from the Federal courts the original jurisdiction in cases between citizens of different States and between the different States themselves. When the Constitution was adopted there was reason for that provision. Then the colonies were to a great extent distinct nations from each other. They had no railroads, they had no facilities of intercommunication. One half the country was slave and the other half was free. Now it is all homogeneous.

Take away that jurisdiction and the courts would soon clear up all their dockets, and there would be no trouble in the world about it. I cannot see a reason why a citizen of Kentucky may not sue a citizen of Ohio in a State court in Cincinnati as well as in the Federal court, and vice versa. Take away all this jurisdiction, and your Federal judges will have time to sleep upon the woolsack more than half the terms of their courts. I should vote against the measure if every single amendment had been adopted, but naked as it is I regard it as fraught with more mischief than any measure which has been before Congress since I have been a member of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER.]

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) As I stated before, I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GEORGE, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I inadvertently voted on the amendment. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.] I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, (after having voted in the negative,) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.] When I voted I was not aware that he was out of the Chamber. I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Beck,	Grover,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Call,	Hampton,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Coke,	Harris,	Maxey,	Vest,
Davis of West Va.,	Jackson,	Morgan,	Voorhees,

Cockrell,	Hale,	Platt,
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Ransom,
Fair,	Ingalls,	Saulsbury,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. I move to add as an additional section to the bill the following:

SEC. —. That whenever the jurisdiction of any circuit or district court of the United States, either as to cases originally instituted therein or removed into the circuit courts from a State court, depends by law upon the citizenship of any party or person, a party thereto or having a controversy in a suit therein, the said court shall have no jurisdiction unless the amount in controversy shall exceed the sum of $5,000 exclusive of interest and costs.

That the right to remove a suit, or any part of it, from a State court to a court of the United States when such right depends on the citizenship of any of the parties or persons having a controversy therein, shall exist hereafter only in the cases provided for in this section, and only on the terms herein allowed.

That whenever a suit at law or in equity, in which the amount in controversy, exclusive of cost and interests, exceeds the sum of $500, shall be brought, or shall have heretofore been brought, in a State court, by a citizen of the State in which such court is held, against a citizen of any other State or against an alien, the defendant therein, or if there be more than one defendant, then any one or more of them, being non-residents of the State in which said court is held, and having a controversy in said suit which can be wholly determined as between him or them and the plaintiff without the presence of the other defendant or defendants, shall have the right, at any time before the final trial or hearing thereof, to remove said suit, or so much of it as can be determined as aforesaid without the presence of the other defendant or defendants, to the circuit court of the district in which said State court is held, upon the following terms and to the following extent: the defendant or defendants desiring such removal shall petition said circuit court, or a judge thereof in vacation setting forth that, owing to prejudice against him or them, or the undue influence of the adverse party, he or they cannot have a fair and impartial trial in said State court. Reasonable notice of such petition shall be given to the adverse party of the time and place of the hearing of the same; and said court or judge, on the day fixed for the hearing, shall hear the evidence offered by the parties as to such prejudice or influence, and if satisfied that by reason thereof a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in said State court, shall order a removal of said cause, or so much of it as embraces a controversy between the petitioner and the plaintiff as can be heard without the presence of the other defendants, to the said circuit court, upon the petitioners giving bond and security in the sum of $500, payable to the plaintiff, and conditioned to file in said circuit court, at the first term thereof held after the expiration of twenty days from the date of said order, a complete transcript of the record and proceedings of said State court in said suit, and of all papers filed in said State court as evidence in said cause. In case of a removal of said cause as to part only of the defendants, it may be proceeded with in the State court as to the other defendants as if no such order of removal had been made.

That the provisions of this section shall apply to suits in those district courts of the United States which by law have circuit court jurisdiction.

That no circuit or district court shall have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, or subsequent holder or bearer thereof, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment or transfer had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. In section 10, after the words "Supreme Court," in line 16, I move to strike out all down to and including the words "Supreme Court" in line 21, in the following words:

But in the two last-mentioned cases the court of appeals shall state the specific question arising upon the construction of the Constitution, or the construction or the validity of such treaty or law, or the specific legal question that the adjudication involves, and such questions only shall be certified to and finally decided by the Supreme Court.

That is the question to which I made reference, to which my attention was called by a member of the Committee on the Judiciary. It seems to me, and it seemed also to the member to whom I refer, that it is giving to the circuit courts, to the court of appeals, or to any other court, in fact, too much power to state the specific question arising upon the construction of the Constitution, or the construction or the validity of the treaty or law, or the specific legal question that the adjudication involves, and that such question only shall be certified to and finally decided by the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court ought to be allowed to determine what the constitutional question is upon the law as well as the question arising upon the fact. The court below can make the decision and then assume the right to state the question in a form that it understands it or merely in the form it desires to have it passed upon. In this way litigants may be put to very serious trouble. It deprives the Supreme Court of the power of deciding whether the real question was in the case or was not in the case. If the court below can make the exact question, whether of law or of fact, upon which the Supreme Court is to decide, then I submit that we take from the Supreme Court a very important part of its appellate jurisdiction.

The bill, it seems to me, would be just as well with that provision out of it. The court could state the facts upon which the question arose, or it could state the facts which affect the decision upon the Constitution, the law, or the treaty, and allow the Supreme Court to determine whether that question was really raised upon those facts, or what question was raised upon the facts. It must very often occur in practice that upon a given state of facts the party in the cause would desire that the Supreme Court should determine a certain question which he insists is raised upon the facts. The court below decides against him; it decides that that question is not raised upon the facts, but that some other or different question is raised upon the facts, and you thereby deprive a man virtually of his right of appeal by permitting the court below to decide the very question upon which his appeal shall turn in the court above.

It seems to me that that is an important matter, and if the bill would be as well without it as with it that part of the section ought to be stricken out. I regret that the Senator to whom I refer has not returned to the Chamber so that he can present his own views on this matter. These are the views which I entertain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this amendment with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN. I submit the following motion:

Resolved, That Senate bill No. 420, now under consideration, be committed again to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to said committee to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, a bill to establish a court of appeals, inferior to the Supreme Court, which shall be composed of not exceeding nine circuit judges in addition to the nine circuit judges who are now in office; and which shall define the appellate and supervisory jurisdiction of said court; and shall also confer the power upon the judges of such appellate court to hold circuit courts in any circuit or district of the United States to which they shall respectively be assigned by the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court; and also to make any changes in existing laws, or any new provisions of law that may be necessary in consequence of the creation of such court of appeals, or that will contribute to the relief of the Supreme Court and any of the circuit courts from the embarrassment resulting from an undue accumulation of cases upon their dockets; and will give to persons convicted of crimes against the United States the right to a writ of error to the Supreme Court, or to such court of appeals as said committee may be of opinion will best secure the rights of such persons and of the Government in the administration of justice, and will curtail and regulate the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States in respect of suits by and against corporations and the removal of causes, and in such other respects as said committee shall recommend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama to commit with the instructions read.

Mr. MORGAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] and I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] I make this statement for the day.

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER.]

Mr. MILLER, of New York, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I voted inadvertently. I wish to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GEORGE. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL,] but I desire it to be put on record that, if not paired, I would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. HAMPTON. I should like to ask if the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] is not paired?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. He is paired with the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HAMPTON. He was in favor of the recommitment of this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Yesterday that pair was arranged I think.

Mr. RANSOM. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONAS. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] requested me to say that he is paired on this bill and all its amendments with his colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.] The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] would vote "yea" on this motion if he were present.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Plumb,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. For the purpose of getting before the Senate and the committee the proposition of the committee of the American Bar Association, if the Senate should desire to recommit the bill, I now move to recommit it without instructions in order that the opinions of such gentlemen as Mr. Merrick, Mr. Courtlandt Parker, and Mr. Evarts may be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary in framing some measure which will meet with more general acceptance than the one now before the Senate. I do not concur in the proposition those gentlemen have presented; I do not think the Supreme Court can be divided into sections and that each section can decide without the concurrence of the other section. At the same time they have advanced views in support of their opinion which are worthy of the consideration of the Senate. They are men of most eminent legal attainments, and I will send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read extracts from the report they have made.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I hope the Senator will let us take a vote. Everybody has read what those gentlemen have said.

Mr. MORGAN. I am afraid not.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I have, for one, and I think every Senator has. It is a consumption of time to have their report read.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the Senator from Alabama how long the reading of the extracts will take?

Mr. MORGAN. A very few minutes.

Mr. VOORHEES. If it is to take long I shall move an adjournment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I object to the reading of that paper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the Senator from Alabama has a perfect right to have a paper read as a part of his remarks if he sees proper to do so.

Mr. ANTHONY. He has a right to read it himself, but not a right to have it read at the desk.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let it be read if he calls for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island raise a question of order?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will not dispute with the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed to read the paper sent up by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask to have it read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Do I understand the Senator from Alabama to read now from the pamphlet as his own views the sentiments expressed there?

Mr. MORGAN. As far as I propose to read them I think I can say they are.

Mr. MORGAN proceeded to read, but was interrupted by

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the Senator from Alabama will not be compelled to read that. I trust the Secretary may be allowed to read it for him. It is customary that the Secretary should be allowed to read at the desk.

Mr. MORGAN. Objection is made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had instructed the Secretary to read the paper, but the Senator from Alabama proceeded to read it himself.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be unwilling to withhold any courtesy from the Senator from Alabama in the matter.

Mr. RANSOM. Certainly it has always been usual in the Senate, I think, to allow a Senator to have a paper read.

Mr. MORGAN. I have sat here all night hearing one Senator read for another.

Mr. ANTHONY. I withdraw the point of order, but I will vindicate my right to make the point:

When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any Senator, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, and without debate.

I withdraw the point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What does the Senator read from?

Mr. ANTHONY. From the fifteenth rule of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, on reading the rule, holds that the Senator from Rhode Island is quite right in the point of order he suggested.

Mr. ALLISON. The point is withdrawn, and the Senator from Alabama can have read at the desk what he wishes.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly such men as Mr. Evarts and Mr. Parker and Mr. Bradley and Mr. Phelps have a right to be heard when their opinions are expressed upon a grave question of this kind, and while Senators may have all read this paper the country has not read it, and I do not think that any injustice will be done to the country or the Senate by putting this on record as part of my remarks.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator yield to me for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MORGAN. I shall yield to the Senator from Missouri for a motion to adjourn if he has any personal reason for desiring that the Senate shall now adjourn, but I rather prefer that we should finish this business.

Mr. VEST. I think we shall not conclude this bill this evening. The Senator from Alabama and other Senators wish to address the Senate. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield the floor for the purpose of a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MORGAN. Not unless the Senator from Missouri will say that he has some personal desire in having the Senate adjourn. I prefer to see the bill concluded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. So do I.

Mr. BUTLER. So far as I am concerned, I prefer to adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I sincerely hope the bill may be concluded this evening. I think the interests of the business of the Senate require it.

Mr. MORGAN. I am entirely willing that it shall appear upon the record that I have read the extracts which are marked in this pamphlet, if that will be any relief to the Senate. I do not wish to occupy their time in reading, but I want this paper to go into the RECORD as part of my remarks, so far as I have marked passages in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the marked parts of the paper the Senator suggests appearing in the RECORD? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The extracts are as follows:

It is proposed by those gentlemen who advocate the plan of local courts of appeal to constitute one in each circuit, from the circuit and district judges, which shall sit in one of its larger cities. We have felt great respect for the opinion of our able and distinguished associates who favor this proposal, and have not failed to appreciate the arguments by which it is supported. Their views will be presented in a separate report. It is undoubtedly true that such a method of hearing appeals would bring the hearing nearer to the residence of the litigants, and considerably facilitate the convenience of the profession in the more distant circuits, and perhaps to some extent diminish the expense of appeals, by saving a journey from remote points to Washington. Though on this point it is to be remembered that as the court could sit but in one place for each circuit, and many of these are very large, a considerable proportion of the appeals must after all be heard at a distance from the residence of the parties, and from the court in which the trial appealed from took place. So that the difference to counsel between the journey thus requisite and the journey to Washington is not so material.

But it appears to us that the grave objections which the plan of local courts encounters far outweigh any advantages it may offer of convenience to counsel or of diminution of expense to parties. In the first place, in order that this method should effect any relief to the Supreme Court, it will be necessary to provide that appeals to that tribunal should not be allowed in cases of ordinary jurisdiction unless the amount in controversy is at least $10,000. Probably a much higher limit than that would be necessary, because when the limit of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was enlarged in 1872 from two thousand to five thousand dollars, hardly any perceptible diminution in the docket resulted. And notwithstanding that limit the number of causes on the docket of the court has increased from 676 in 1872 to 1,202 in 1880, although during that period, as has been already pointed out, the number of causes annually disposed of by the court considerably exceeded the number disposed of in any previous year. While on this point it is impossible to obtain exact data without an amount of labor in the examination of the records of the court which it is not in our power to command, we believe on the best information we have that to enable the court to keep up with the business by reducing the amount of it by a money limit would require that limit to be fixed at the present time at least as high as $15,000, and perhaps as high as $20,000, and would necessitate in the future a probable further advance in the same direction.

The number of people of the United States who are possessed of property to that amount is comparatively small; the number of those whose controversies in the courts of justice attain such a magnitude is still smaller. To the great mass of litigants controversies involving between five and fifteen thousand dollars are very serious and important, not infrequently putting in jeopardy all they possess. The extension of the limit of the right of appeal to the Supreme Court from two thousand to five thousand dollars has already been felt oppressive. Nothing but a supposed necessity has induced submission to it. And a further increase of that limit to a sum that excludes from the court so large a class of citizens in controversies to them so important, and which involve questions as serious and as difficult as causes of a still larger amount would be a measure in the justice or propriety or policy of which we cannot concur, and which we believe would justly be regarded as a denial of the highest public justice to many citizens equally entitled to it.

The Supreme Court would thus be set aside, so far as its ordinary jurisdiction is concerned, for the benefit of wealthy men and great corporations. But the court was never intended for the use of the rich alone. It belongs to the people, in common with our other institutions, and should be made available to the people, to every possible extent. That some pecuniary limit must be fixed, to save the court from being harassed with small controversies, and to exclude from it causes not large enough to pay the expense of going there, is admitted. The sum of $2,000, the original limit, has always been regarded as quite sufficient for that purpose; and while we do not recommend a present return to that figure, we cannot concur in any proposition to increase it.

Nor can we regard without apprehension the probable effect upon the position of the court itself, of thus withdrawing from it so large a share of its general jurisdiction. As the final arbiter upon all questions of constitutional law, it is one of the main stays of our Government. No such function was ever before confided to a judicial tribunal. It can only be maintained in the discharge of so critical a duty by being fast anchored in the public confidence and esteem. Such has been its good fortune hitherto, because it has been the Supreme Court in reality as well as in name. It has been the one national tribunal of last appeal, in which confidence has been strong, and to which resort has been secure; where the general law of the land has been habitually laid down. But that will be really the Supreme Court in the estimation of the people in which the duties belonging to such a body are accustomed to be performed.

If the one Supreme Court of the Constitution should be closed to ordinary access, and devoted by a high-money limit principally to the service of the wealthy and the powerful; if the great body of those who transact the business of the country should be excluded from its doors, and compelled to accept for their part such humbler justice as the local tribunals may afford, it will not be safe to expect that the court will be able to preserve by its dignity the hold it has gained by its usefulness, or to escape by mere pecuniary elevation from the consequences of popular estrangement. There would be grave danger that it might gradually become an object of public jealousy and aversion. If thereafter it should happen to be brought, in the determination of constitutional questions, into antagonism with popular feeling or party policy, its position would invite an attack, against which its means of defense would be small. De Tocqueville has well said of its power, "it is clothed in the authority of public opinion. They are the all-powerful guardians of a people which respects law; but they would be impotent against popular neglect or popular contempt."

* * * * * * *

Another very serious objection, in our judgment, to the institution of local courts of appeal is to be found in its probable result upon the character and quality of the law they may be expected to establish. The body of the common law, as administered by the Federal tribunals, is one of our most precious possessions. The purity and uniformity of it should be guarded with the greatest assiduity. It is the law, not of one State, but of all the States; not of a section, but of the entire people; not of local interests, but of the general welfare. It is the only homogeneous law we have. We have already courts of the last resort sitting in thirty-eight different States, no one necessarily controlled by the decisions of any other. That the expositions of the law in these numerous tribunals should be fluctuating, far from uniform, and more or less of it far from sound, is unavoidable. That it should be pervaded by the influence of local institutions and traditions, of varying political sentiments and diverse financial, productive, and commercial interests, is naturally to be expected. But as the law thus established is supreme only in the State in which it is propounded, no grave results are to be apprehended to the citizens of other States, so long as they can have recourse, in the event of controversy with the citizens of such State, to the Federal courts.

That the decisions of the proposed local Federal courts of appeal will be largely affected in the same way, seems to us inevitable. They would sit in districts very remote from each other. They would be necessarily composed of judges drawn from the circuits in which they exist. That views upon financial questions, political or quasi-political questions, social questions, and the general policy of the law, should vary and change under the pressure of local opinions, traditions and laws, is inevitable. Law is at best but a reflex of the society and the civilization in which it grows up. To expect that distant tribunals, existing under widely different conditions of society and of public opinion, should be harmonious in the multiform administration which justice requires is to expect the impossible. Such has never been the case and never will be. The course of decisions in New England and the Southwest, in the commercial cities and the Northwestern States on the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts, can never be one and the same if it depends upon their local tribunals. The whole theory and value of the Federal administration of justice requires a uniformity and consistency of application before which the citizens of all the States shall be equal. But in place of that we should have under these local appellate courts a mass of heterogeneous decisions, on many points irreconcilable, and a law that would vary like the climate with the latitude and the longitude.

Nine tribunals of last resort in the great majority of cases would be kept in constant operation, and emitting an incessant series of reports, with no central power or ultimate court of appeal to regulate their conclusions. It would be but occasionally that a cause involving questions of difference between them would arise large enough to be carried, and that would happen to be carried, to the Supreme Court of the United States. It is the every-day law, which is constantly applied to human business and human rights, that is of the greatest practical importance, rather than those cases of rare occurrence, to which political events or public feeling may give a more conspicuous prominence.

EDWARD J. PHELPS, Chairman.
CORTLANDT PARKER.
WILLIAM M. EVARTS.
RICHARD T. MERRICK.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, I have a single remark to make in regard to the opinion of these four very distinguished lawyers, Messrs. Phelps, Parker, Evarts, and Merrick. They have bestowed as much attention on this subject as perhaps any gentlemen in the United States. Their experience no man can deny; their opinion no man can afford to pass by without due attention. I desire that their opinions in connection with this bill, which is now about to pass, shall go before the country, in the hope that before this measure can be matured and enacted into law public opinion will intervene and prevent the consummation of the wrongs that I conceive are wrapped up in this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves to recommit the bill without instructions.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Before the Senator goes on if he will indulge me one moment I desire to move an amendment.

This bill, Mr. President, as I stated, does not abridge or enlarge the jurisdiction of the circuit court or of any other court whatever, and the Judiciary Committee in putting in the sixth section did not mean to have it so considered, nor could it be so construed by any court in christendom; but some of my friends, for whose opinion I have great regard, say that it would be better if certain words were added, and I have consulted with my friends on the committee and there can be no objection to the amendment. The section now reads:

The said courts—

That is, the court of appeals—shall have power to issue writs of error, mandamus, scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs which may be necessary or proper to the exercise of its jurisdiction and agreeable to the principles and usages of law.

I move to add there—

And which the circuit courts of the United States now have.

Mr. RANSOM. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Illinois for suggesting that amendment. I had thought myself that the clause which is referred to was conclusive upon that subject, but I desire, in common with a great many Senators, to have the question put beyond the possibility of controversy.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move the amendment.

Mr. RANSOM. I am much obliged to the Senator for the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed, in section 6, line 45, after the word "law," to add "and which the circuit courts of the United States now have;" so as to read:

The said court shall have power to issue writs of error, mandamus, scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs which may be necessary or proper to the exercise of its jurisdiction and agreeable to the principles and usages of law, and which the circuit courts of the United States now have.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Alabama yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. PUGH. I am willing to submit to the pleasure of the Senate. I am ready to proceed now, if it is the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I certainly do not want to keep the Senate here, but I want this bill to be acted on.

Mr. VEST. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If there is an agreement to take a vote on the bill, say at three o'clock to-morrow—— ["Yes!" "Yes!"]

Mr. ALLISON rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the motion to adjourn withdrawn for the present?

Mr. VEST. No, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. One moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is out of order pending the motion to adjourn.

Mr. VEST. If there can be an agreement, I will yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] is recognized.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the proposition will be stated from the Chair, so that we shall all understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the understanding that a vote shall be taken on this bill——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. At four o'clock to-morrow is now proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By four o'clock to-morrow? [A pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and it will be understood as the agreement of the Senate by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. After four o'clock there shall not be any debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The agreement is to vote at four.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. On the bill and amendments.

Mr. VEST. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and thirty-one minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

The SPEAKER. The point having been made that no quorum is present, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I will waive the point of order if I can have a chance to submit some reports.

Mr. REED. The gentleman has a promise, so far as I am concerned, to put in his reports.

Mr. RANDALL. I object. I do not agree to a gentleman forcing the House in such a way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be willing to recognize the gentleman from New York, but the regular order being called for it has no discretion in the matter.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I insist on the point that a quorum is not present unless I am permitted to submit my reports.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. RANDALL and Mr. VAN VOORHIS as tellers.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. At the suggestion of gentlemen I withdraw the point that a quorum is not present.

So the morning hour was dispensed with, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent yesterday when the vote was taken on the passage of the agricultural department bill. I was attending to committee matters at the time. If I had been present, I would have voted in favor of the passage of that bill.

GENEVA AWARD.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business having been demanded, the House now resumes as the unfinished business of yesterday the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4197) re-establishing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, on which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, the Geneva award was for $15,500,000. Of this sum $9,553,800, including accrued interest, are still in the Treasury. The occasion of this award was the claim by our Government that Great Britain had failed to perform her duty as a neutral during the war of the rebellion in this, that she did not exercise due diligence in preventing the Alabama and the several other insurgent vessels which were built, fitted, and manned in her ports and by her citizens from sailing on their insurgent mission, though repeatedly notified by our Government of the warlike character and purpose of these vessels; and that as the direct result of this neglect of her duty, our citizens sustained heavy losses in the destruction upon the high seas of their ships and merchandise.

It was the duty of Great Britain as a neutral power to prevent her citizens from aiding and assisting the rebellion; and if the British authorities paid no attention, as in fact they did not, to the repeated notices from our Government as to the character of these vessels, but allowed them to sail, this in itself, under the law of nations, was an act of war on her part.

It left her no longer a neutral but made her an ally of the enemy. This conduct on the part of Great Britain, resulting as it did in heavy losses to our citizens, was not, however, an offense against those citizens for which they could obtain redress of Great Britain, for the reason that it was an act of war. And no system of law, international or municipal, has provided a remedy by an individual for an act of war. The offense was not against the suffering citizens, though the mischief happened to be visited upon them, but was against the Government of the United States, for which under the law of nations she had a remedy if she was able to enforce it, and that was to appeal to arms and administer such punishment as should satisfy her offended dignity and make such reprisals as should indemnify for the losses of her citizens and all other losses incurred in consequence of such misconduct, including even the expenses of the war for satisfaction. In short, under the law of nations we could have proceeded until we were entirely satisfied. But the United States adopted another course. They sought first a friendly adjustment by agreement; but failing in that, they then negotiated for and finally obtained a settlement of the difficulty by arbitration, which resulted in an award of the gross sum above stated, not to individuals but to the United States, in satisfaction for all losses or damage to her or any of her citizens which the wrongful act of Great Britain had occasioned.

And here another fact should be noted. It is this: that those citizens of the United States whose merchandise was captured and ships destroyed by these confederate privateers had no remedy under existing law against the Government of the United States, for the simple reason that the loss was by an act of war. And though the Government owes its citizens protection, and for that reason they might have a moral claim upon the Government, yet it lies wholly within the breast of the Government whether or not it will compensate for such losses, and, as a rule, relief is only granted in cases of peculiar hardship. The citizen's only remedy is to appeal to the generosity of the Government. And now, keeping in mind the fact that the citizen suffering loss or damage by an act of war has no legal remedy whatever against either his own Government or the government committing the act, or against the individual or individuals committing the act, if it be an act of war, let us ask to whom shall the balance of this Geneva award be paid? There are three classes of claimants.

First. The marine insurance companies, which claim payment for the money paid by them as insurance upon destroyed ships and captured cargoes. Their claims would absorb the whole sum.

Second. The uninsured owners of vessels destroyed by the Nashville, Tallahassee, Shenandoah, before she reached Melbourne, and eight other cruisers, on account of which the Geneva tribunal did not hold Great Britain responsible, and which are known in this discussion as the "exculpated cruisers." These owners suffered actual loss and ask to be made whole. Their claim is for about twelve hundred thousand dollars.

Third. The ship-owners who paid war risks to the insurance companies, but whose ships were not destroyed, claim as actual losses by these cruisers to the extent of "war premiums" so paid. Their claims amount close to nine million dollars.

The losses of all the ship-owners from the acts of the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah, after Melbourne, called the "inculpated cruisers," have already been paid out of the award as provided under the act of 1874. In other words, they have been made whole. If they were uninsured the whole loss has been paid them; if insured, then so much of their loss as their insurance did not cover.

The insurance companies were also under the same act made whole. They were paid out of this fund their total losses. It is at least to be presumed that they were, for by that act every one of them had an opportunity to go before the distributing court and claim upon the whole of their war-risk business, including losses by the "exculpated cruisers," that they had sustained an actual loss, and to the extent of that loss receive full indemnity from this fund. But only to that extent, for the act itself contained this provision:

> No claim shall be allowed in behalf of an insurer (individual or corporate) unless his losses on war risks exceeded the sum of his premiums on war risks during the rebellion. Act of 1874.

Under this act only three insurance companies appeared and claimed that upon the whole they had suffered losses in taking the war risks, and they were able to show the loss of only a small sum which has been paid them. The fact that other companies did not appear to claim a loss shows conclusively enough that they were not losers; but how much they made is not in every case apparent.

It is a fact, however, that the net profits of the eight New York companies which did a large share of the business were $2,295,332.96 larger for the five years from 1861 to 1865, during the time of this business, after paying all losses, war and otherwise, than for the five years from 1866 to 1870. Thus do we see that the small loss suffered by three of these companies has been paid to them, and that the others, or some of them at least, made a large profit out of their war-risk business. And yet they are before Congress to-day asking the bulk if not the whole of this fund, not upon the ground that they have been losers and that in equity it belongs to them, but upon the technical legal doctrine that it was received by the United States from Great Britain as money due to them, and that the United States holds it as a mere trustee and can only pay it over to them in discharge of the trust. That in the disposition of the money the Government has no discretion whatever, and nothing to do but to stand and deliver. The argument in support of this position is a very plausible and captivating one. Its advocates call attention to that familiar principle of law by which an underwriter who has paid for property destroyed is entitled to be substituted to all the rights and remedies which the owner may have, to reimburse himself for the loss. If the risk be a simple marine risk and the ship is wrecked, whatever may be saved from the wreck belongs to the insurer; or if through the fault of another vessel she was disabled and lost in mid-ocean, the underwriter would succeed to whatever remedy the owner might have against the vessel by whose wrongful act his own was lost. In short, under this doctrine of subrogation the insurer, by payment of insurance, succeeds to all the rights of the insured. He owns whatever may be left of the property. He may pursue any remedy which the owner could have pursued. The insurance companies say they insured against capture; that the vessels were captured and that the United States recovered at Geneva for those captured vessels, and in doing this the United States acted as agent of the claimants, and having received the money they hold it in trust precisely as an agent or attorney does money which he has collected for a client. This, in brief, is the claim of the insurance companies. It rests, as will be seen, upon the cold technicalities of law; upon a set of legal sequences which they claim would, before a legal tribunal, inevitably give them this money.

It is a purely legal question, and as such invites legal scrutiny. The trouble with it is, it starts out upon a false assumption. The very first step in the line of reasoning is a false one. It assumes that the owners of the destroyed vessels and cargoes had a legal claim against Great Britain for their loss, to which the insurance companies, under the law, would be subrogated. But we have already seen that this could not be so, for the reason that the destruction of this property by these insurgent cruisers was an act of war, committed under the confederate flag, by order of the confederate government; and the charge against Great Britain was that she so conducted herself that instead of maintaining her neutrality, as under the proclamation of the Queen she was bound to do, she became a participant in this act of war, and so answerable to the Government of the United States, but no more answerable to the individuals suffering loss than were the confederate vessels or the confederate government.

Any act committed on the high seas by authority of the confederate government was as much an act of war as if committed by Lee's army in Virginia or Pennsylvania; and who ever heard of a lawyer in either of those States bringing trespass quare clausum in behalf of some indignant farmer upon whose wheat-field the commanding general of either army pitched his camp or his battle? Or, who ever heard of the unlucky soldier on either side bringing suit for assault and battery for a malignant bayonet-thrust from the other. The old Latin maxim obtains—Inter arma silent leges. If an act be an act of war, the law takes no knowledge of it. There is no legal redress for it. This is why the owners of these destroyed vessels had no legal claim against either Great Britain or the United States, or the individuals destroying them. If this be so—and no principle in law is better settled—then the insured had no legal rights to which the insurers could be subrogated; and wanting this, the whole argument fails. Its foundation is gone.

The only possible right which the owners of these destroyed vessels had to which the insurance companies could be subrogated was the privilege of appealing to the generosity of the Government of the United States; not to the courts, for as they had no legal claim they could have no standing-place in a legal forum; but to the generosity and justice of the Government as embodied in the highest court known to our system, the Congress of the United States. But from this tribunal, possessing as its does a law and equity jurisdiction limited only by the Constitution and the conscience of its members, these insurance companies are seeking to escape.

They want their claim to this fund referred to the courts, and the minority of the committee recommend that it be so referred, not to be considered by the courts with the same discretionary power and the same unlimited jurisdiction which Congress holds over the subject, but to be determined by the courts upon the strict rules and the analogies of law.

But we have already seen that if the question were in the courts the decision upon legal grounds ought to be against the insurance companies; and if against them, the courts would still have no power to award the fund, in the exercise of an equitable discretion, to the other claimants. They could only say that no one had any legal claim to it, whereby the whole subject would again revert to Congress, and the delay in the distribution of this money, already in the estimation of some discreditable to that body, be still further prolonged. If, however, inasmuch as the insurance companies are already made whole, the courts upon legal grounds would give them this fund, then that in itself is sufficient reason why it should be withheld from them and disposed of by Congress according to its sense of justice and equity. What the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. REED] says upon this point in reporting the bill is so well said that I cannot do better than adopt it. It is as follows:

To the proposition to refer the matter to a court, your committee are strenuously opposed. No court established to try the ordinary affairs between man and man is competent to deal with this subject. Courts of this kind are governed by general rules, which do justice in the great majority of cases, but injustice in many. If any of their rules could be stretched by analogy or construction, so as to cover this case—which we do not believe—they might do injustice, for the general rules must prevail regardless of the result. There is no court in the land which has not decided cases with expressions of regret at injustice done in the particular, to save justice to be done in the general. For these acts of injustice we have a consolation in the ordinary affairs of life, that the average would be right, and that the largest amount of justice attainable in courts could be done only under general rules. This consolation we could not have in the matter now before us. There can be no average where there is only one.

To take a case from a tribunal which can do justice and give it to a tribunal which may not, would be both wrong and delusive. It has the further disadvantage of not meeting the question in an open way. The duty belongs to Congress to determine the principles which will do justice in this particular case. If there were a series of such cases likely to occur a general law might be made which on the whole would do average justice.

* * * * * * *

If this case were one of a series which had happened, and was likely to happen in large numbers in the ordinary affairs of men, it might be well to relegate it to a court which had the stored wisdom of ages adapted to every-day affairs. But when a question involving large interests unlike anything ever before considered by men comes up for decision before a tribunal which has all the power necessary to do right, it will not be doing its duty if it delegates the question to another and an unsuitable tribunal of limited powers simply because the question proves to be complex and difficult.

* * * * * * *

We are well aware that the proposition has been gilded by the words, "justice and equity and the laws of nations," but those words in this case are beguiling. When these things are talked of before Congress, "justice and equity" mean a comprehensive "justice and equity," which Congress alone can administer. But, after such a bill had passed, "justice and equity" would be the justice and equity of law, which is a widely different thing.

Whatever other points may be in doubt, it must be accepted as clear that it is the duty of Congress to speedily dispose of this subject, and as equally clear that it possesses full jurisdiction in every aspect of the case, legal as well as equitable. Then why refer it to the courts; why not promptly dispose of it ourselves?

But the insurance companies, still suggesting legal grounds for their claim, say, though they had no legal claim against Great Britain, still the United States presented it, such as it was, and have received the money upon it, thereby creating the relation of trustee, by which there is so much money in the hands of the United States belonging to them. If this relation of trustee, in a legal sense, exists; if the United States collected a claim against Great Britain as a claim due these insurance companies, and it was so understood by Great Britain, the United States ought to be estopped, and would be estopped in a court of justice, from now denying that it belonged to them; and Congress could not honorably withhold the money from them for a moment, notwithstanding the fact that their losses have already been made good, and that this whole fund would be so much clean profit added to their already large gains out of their war-risk business, as in fact it would be.

The trouble with this proposition, however, is that the United States did not present any claim at Geneva as the claim of an individual. The affair at Geneva was not one between individuals and Great Britain, but between the United States and Great Britain. It should be kept in mind that the wrongful act committed by Great Britain was not against individuals, but against the majesty, the dignity, and the peace of the United States; and that wrongful act, so far as Great Britain was concerned, was complete the moment the insurgent cruisers left her ports on their warlike mission; and what they afterward did could be referred to, and was referred to, in the arbitration only for the purpose of showing the damage that resulted from that wrongful act.

The following instructions to our agent at Geneva, from Secretary Fish, show whether the United States Government understood it was acting in a way to create a technical trusteeship, containing all the legal and moral obligations of that relation. They are as follows:

The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between two governments. In the discussion of this question and in the treatment of the entire case you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide upon the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution.

Could anything be more explicit as to the purpose of our Government? The understanding of Great Britain was equally clear. Mr. Gladstone, at that time prime minister, said when interrogated in Parliament:

The Alabama claim was a public claim arising between the two governments.

Also that—

No claims of individuals have been submitted to arbitration in relation to the Alabama. What was submitted to arbitration was entirely a matter between two governments.—Foreign Relations, United States, pages 74, 377.

From the foregoing it is apparent that what the United States did at Geneva they did upon their own account as a nation and not as a claim-agent for individuals, although individual claims were the meritorious cause of the allowance, precisely as the minor child is the meritorious cause of the claim due to his father, not to himself, for his earnings.

The minor child, unless emancipated, has no claim for his earnings. He cannot bring suit against the man for whom he has labored any more than these individuals could have brought suit against Great Britain for these claims. The father alone can enforce a claim for the earnings of his minor child, and whoever heard of the father by reason of collecting such a claim being made a trustee of his child? No more could the nation be made a trustee for the claim of a citizen which the nation alone could collect. An instinctive parental justice in the one case would deal liberally, at least justly, with the child on account of the fund, and in the other case a lively sense of national justice stands ready to deal fairly with every American citizen whose claims were the meritorious cause of this allowance against Great Britain. Nevertheless the insurance companies desire the consideration of this question of trusteeship by a more technical tribunal than Congress; one in which the common law, which we are told is only another name for common sense, is administered.

Let us, then, invoke the common law as administered by the courts of England in which it had its birth. This question has never yet been decided by the courts of the United States for the reason that it has never yet come before them; but it has been repeatedly decided in England, and always that no trusteeship was created in favor of the citizen against the government for money received, as the Geneva award was received, by our Government. A single case, however, must suffice, the case of Rustomjee vs. The Queen, 122 Queen's Bench, 477.

The Emperor of China paid the Queen of Great Britain under a treaty $3,000,000 on account of debts due British subjects from Chinese merchants who had become insolvent.

Rustomjee was one of these creditors, and brought his "petition of right" against the Queen for his debt, claiming that the government held it in trust for him, precisely as the insurance companies claim in this case. The Court of Queen's Bench, Sir Alexander Cockburn, one of the arbitrators at Geneva, delivering the opinion, said:

In such a case a petition of right will not lie. The notion that the Queen of this country, in receiving a sum of money in order to do justice to some of her subjects, to whom otherwise injustice would be done, becomes the agent of those subjects, seems to me really too wild a notion to require a single word of observation beyond that of emphatically condemning it. In like manner, to say that the sovereign becomes the "trustee for subjects on whose behalf money has been received by the Crown," appears to be equally untenable. It comes simply to this, that her majesty, in order to enable her to see that injustice is not done to her subjects, stipulates for the payment in her hands of a sum of money. The distribution of that must be left to her majesty's discretion.

This case was taken to the court of appeals, and the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench affirmed, Lord Coleridge, chief justice, saying:

We assent, upon full consideration, to the reasoning of the judges in the court below. The making of peace and the making of war, as they are the undoubted, so they are perhaps the highest acts of the prerogative of the Crown. The terms on which peace is made are in the absolute discretion of the sovereign.

* * * * * * *

The Queen might or not, as she thought fit, have made peace at all; she might or not, as she thought fit, have insisted on this money being paid her. * * * We do not say that under no circumstances can the Crown be a trustee; we do not even say that under no circumstances can the Crown be an agent; but it seems clear to us that in all that relates to the making and performance of a treaty with another sovereign the Crown is not, and cannot be, either a trustee or an agent for any subject whatever.

We do not, indeed, doubt that on the payment of the money by the Emperor of China there was a duty on the part of the English sovereign to administer the money so received according to the stipulations of the treaty, but it was a duty to do justice to her subjects according to the advice of her responsible minister; not the duty of an agent to a principal, or of a trustee to a cestui que trust.

What do the insurance companies say to this decision? In a pamphlet just out, reviewing the majority report, counsel for the Great Western Insurance Company make this answer——

Mr. HOOKER. Will it interrupt the gentleman from Vermont to ask a single question in this connection?

Mr. GROUT. Not at all, only I do not consent that it shall come out of my time.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to know of the gentleman from Vermont if these insurance companies who are claiming a part of this fund have incurred risks and losses, why they should not be entitled to their proper proportion of the fund as well as anybody else?

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman from Mississippi had heard the first portion of my remarks just submitted to the House, he could not fail to see that their actual losses had all been met. When he talks about the matter of "risks" he enters an uncertain realm.

Mr. HOOKER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that their actual losses have been paid out of this fund?

Mr. GROUT. Out of this very fund, certainly; every dollar of them. They were entitled to go before the court under the act of 1874 and receive the amount of their losses. Only three of the companies went before the court, as has been already shown, and they have been paid their losses. Presumably those who did not appear suffered no loss. It is moreover quite clear that they made large profits out of their war-risk business.

The following is the answer, Mr. Speaker, of the insurance companies to the decision in Rustomgee vs. The Queen, as made in the pamphlet already referred to:

The language relied upon in this decision does not justify the inference that a republican form of government should follow the example because a sovereign by divine right may refuse to recognize his agency to a subject which would hardly become a republican government, elected by the people as their agents and trustees.

To this it is only necessary to reply in the language of the Supreme Court in Savings Bank vs. United States, 19 Wall., 237, in which Mr. Justice Strong, giving the per curiam opinion, says:

It may be considered as settled that so much of the royal prerogatives as belong to the King in his capacity of parens patriæ enters as much into our political state as it does into the principles of the British constitution.

The sovereign power of the state, the power to execute the laws, to declare war, and make peace, is the same thing wherever or however exercised. In Great Britain it exists in the Crown. In the United States it rests primarily with the people; but as a political entity, through which the state expresses itself, it is found in the President and Congress; and if under the common law the British Crown is held free to dispose of money received from another power for the benefit of its subjects, in like manner the sovereign power of the United States must be left free to dispose of money received from another power for the benefit of her citizens.

Other decisions might be cited, but the case of Rustomjee against the Queen must be accepted as disposing of all claim by the insurance companies to this fund on the ground of agency or trusteeship, and as leaving it rightfully under the control of the sovereign power of the nation to be disposed of according to its sense of justice.

Now, to whom should Congress order this fund paid? We have seen that it is free from all legal claim on the part of any one; especially free from legal claim on the part of the insurance companies. In the face of this fact and the further fact that they have already been made whole, will any one say that they have an equal moral claim with those who suffered similarly but have not yet been made whole? No! Every instinct of justice goes out toward those who are still unpaid. Who are they? The second and third classes of claimants in the list already given, namely, those who suffered losses from the "exculpated cruisers" and those who paid "war premiums" to the insurance companies. The bill reported by the majority of the committee provides for the payment of these claims. Ought there to be objection to this? Manifestly not; and yet there is. Who objects? The insurance companies. Their objection, so far as their own claim to it is concerned, has been disposed of. But they raise a further objection, not upon moral or equitable considerations, but upon the technical legal ground (their objections are all of a technical character) that as this second and third class of claims were not allowed at Geneva, they should not be allowed or paid by the United States; at least, not out of this fund; thereby leaving it in the Treasury, unless they can have it, in the hope, of course, that it may somehow yet be reached by them.

It is true these claims were not allowed at Geneva; but let us see why not allowed. They were presented by the United States for allowance.

The following is the statement as presented by our counsel before the tribunal. (American case, volume 1, page 185.) The second class of claimants now before Congress, namely, for losses by the "exculpated cruisers," was included in item 1. The third class, namely, for "war premiums," is identical with item 4:

1. The claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the insurgent cruisers.
2. The national expenditures in the pursuit of those cruisers.
3. The loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag.
4. The enhanced payments of insurance.
5. The prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion.

The second, third, fourth, and fifth items were wholly disallowed, and so much of item 1 as was for damages by the eleven "exculpated cruisers," holding Great Britain, as already stated, only for the acts of the Alabama, Florida, and the Shenandoah, after Melbourne. It has been thought by many that the allowance against Great Britain was a pitifully small one, as indeed it was when the magnitude of the wrong she did us and the spirit in which she did it are recalled. Under the law of nations, to entitle an insurrection to belligerent rights it must have an army, and, if it has a seaboard, a navy, and must have made such progress in the way of successful revolution as to justify the belief that it will succeed. Now, under this rule see what Great Britain did. So soon as she heard of the firing upon Fort Sumter, by royal proclamation she granted the rebellious States belligerent rights, before they had won a battle or had a single vessel of war afloat.

And then, as if to supply this glaring deficiency among the accepted requisites of nationality, she straightway applied herself to the work of furnishing the confederacy with ships of war, which, only for her proclamation, would have been pirates instead of privateers.*

It was a favorite view of Senators Sumner and Chandler, and many other leading American statesmen, that Great Britain should be called to account for the premature recognition of the revolted States as belligerents in violation of the international code; which, coupled with her conduct in furnishing them with ships of war, made her liable for all the damages done by those ships, both direct and consequential. And it seems that our Government held the same view at one time. This is apparent from the following abstract of the formal note from Secretary Seward to Great Britain, May 20, 1865:

That the act of recognition was precipitate and unprecedented.

That it had the effect of creating these parties belligerents after the recognition, instead of merely acknowledging an existing fact.

* * * * * * *

During the whole course of the struggle in America, of nearly four years in duration, there has been no appearance of the insurgents as a belligerent on the ocean, excepting in the shape of British vessels, constructed, equipped, supplied, manned, and armed in British ports.

* * * * * * *

That the injuries thus received * * * are of so grave a nature as in reason and justice to constitute a valid claim for reparation and indemnification.

* * * * * * *

That the nation that recognized a power as a belligerent before it had built a vessel, and become itself the sole source of all the belligerent character it has ever possessed on the ocean, must be regarded as responsible for all the damage that has ensued from that cause to the commerce of a power with which it was under the most sacred of obligations to preserve amity and peace.

Secretary Seward further wrote officially, June 13, 1868, as follows:

I have been singularly unfortunate in my correspondence if I have not given it clearly to be understood that a violation of neutrality by the Queen's proclamation and kindred proceedings of the British Government is regarded as a national wrong and injury to the United States, and that the lowest form of satisfaction for that national injury that the United States could accept would be found in an indemnity, without reservation or compromise, by the British Government to those citizens of the United States who had suffered individual injury and damage by the vessels of war built, equipped, manned, fitted out, or entertained and protected in the British ports and harbors.

There is not one member of this Government, and, so far as I know, not one citizen of the United States, who expects that this country will waive, in any case, the demands that we have heretofore made upon the British Government.—Correspondence concerning Claims vs. Great Britain, volume 3, page 688.

Now, had the United States insisted upon a settlement with Great Britain in accordance with the above claim, upon the ground of a premature recognition, it is plain that every one of the five items as presented by our counsel at Geneva would have been allowed—including, of course, losses by the "exculpated cruisers" and the "war premiums." Why did not the United States Government insist upon a settlement with Great Britain in accordance with the formal note of May 20, 1865, and the letter of June 13, 1868, and thus have possessed itself of the losses sustained by those two classes of claimants? For the reason that our Government thought it could better serve its interests not to press the claim upon that ground, as will hereafter more fully appear.

The treaty of Washington was ratified June 27, 1871, two ineffectual attempts having previously been made by our minister at Great Britain to reach a basis of settlement. The first did not receive even the approval of the President, and was never submitted to the Senate; the second was rejected by the Senate principally upon the ground that it provided for only individual losses, and not at all for the great national wrong under which the American people were smarting. It did not so much as contain or provide for an apology by Great Britain. But in article 1 of the treaty of Washington is found not only an ample apology but a distinct recognition of the fact that the two governments were arbitrating matters between themselves upon their own account and not upon the account of individuals. It is as follows:

ARTICLE 1. Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of her Britannic majesty, and still exist, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims;" and whereas her Britannic majesty has authorized her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries to express in a friendly spirit the regret felt by her majesty's government for the escape, under whatever circumstances, of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports, and for the depredations committed by those vessels; now, in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims which are not admitted by her Britannic majesty's government, the high contracting parties agree, &c.

The treaty further provided that "the tribunal should decide all questions that shall be laid before them on the part of the two governments," and spoke of the two governments as the "two parties" to the case, and nowhere said anything about individuals in connection with the Alabama claims.

The treaty also laid down three rules of international law, as follows:

First. To use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping, within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction to warlike use.

Second. Not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men.

Third. To exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

These rules Great Britain would not admit were then the law, but she agreed they should govern in the arbitration, and that she would be governed by them in the future and do what she could to secure their adoption by other nations.

* They would have been, in the estimation of English laws, as well as the law of nations, piratical vessels. They never, therefore, would have been on the ocean, and the vessels and cargoes belonging to American citizens destroyed by them would have been in safety. Upon this ground, then, independent of the question of proper diligence, the obligation of Great Britain to meet the losses seems to me to be most apparent.—Reverdy Johnson to Secretary Seward, correspondence concerning claims vs. Great Britain, volume 2, page 764.

The tribunal met on the 15th of December, 1871. The United States presented their case under the five general items already given. Counsel for Great Britain at once objected to the third, fourth, and fifth items as outside the jurisdiction of the tribunal to hear and determine under the treaty.

On the following day the tribunal adjourned to June 13, 1872. Meantime the British press and people entered a violent protest against the consideration by the tribunal of the "indirect losses," included in the three last items, and even went so far as to demand a withdrawal from the arbitration if they were insisted upon when the tribunal should again meet. The tribunal met according to adjournment.

Counsel for the United States submitted their arguments, but Great Britain declined to proceed and asked for a further delay in order to obtain a modification of the treaty excluding the "indirect losses." At this juncture the tribunal announced the following decision:

After the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations, and should, upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there were no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon.—Papers relating to treaty of Washington, vol. 4, p. 20.

This decision was accepted by our Government not only as final but as entirely satisfactory. See Secretary Fish's letter to our agent at Geneva, Mr. Davis, as follows:

In accordance with such judgment and opinion, from henceforth he [the President] regards the claims set forth in the case presented on the part of the United States for loss in the transfer of the American marine to the British flag, the enhanced payment of insurance, and the prolongation of the war and the suppression of the rebellion as adjudicated and disposed of, and that consequently they will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, but are henceforth excluded from its consideration by the tribunal in making up its award.—Correspondence, 152.

Thereupon the trial proceeded, and the tribunal disallowed item two as not being distinguishable from the current expenditures of the war. The whole allowance was under the first item, and the whole of that item allowed except losses by the "exculpated cruisers."

Thus do we see, in the first place the United States Government forebore from pressing their claim for satisfaction upon the ground of the premature recognition of belligerent rights, and accepted therefor, in the treaty of Washington, the three rules of international law; and in the second place, the Government complacently accepted the disallowance by the tribunal, under the three rules, of the "indirect claims." The Government really did more than this. In order to save the arbitration, which was really in peril when Great Britain was refusing to proceed, and asking for a supplemental article to the treaty, (Foreign Relations, volume 2, page 526,) our Government offered to accept such an article.

You may say that this Government regards the new rule contained in the proposed article as the consideration, and will accept it as a final settlement of the three classes of the indirect claims put forth in our case.—Fish to Schenck, same, page 557.

But the matter was finally disposed of by the decision already quoted, which was far more satisfactory to the United States than a supplemental article, for that would have committed only Great Britain to its provisions, whereas the decision of the tribunal committed every one of the five great constitutional powers represented on the tribunal to such a limitation of the duties of a neutral as was thought to be of peculiar advantage to the United States in the future, for the reason that under our traditional policy of non-intervention enjoined by Washington in his Farewell Address and from our comparatively isolated position we shall be likely to be a neutral more of the time in the future than a belligerent, and as a neutral with our great extent of seaboard it might be difficult to always perform our neutral duties. Our Government saw this and thought it might perhaps be well to look a little to the future and not wholly to the past. While we desired a large allowance against Great Britain for her misconduct, we could not afford to have the liabilities of a neutral too much enlarged; could not afford—

To teach a lesson
Which being taught, might return
To plague the inventor.

Accordingly, during the adjournment of the tribunal, the United States directed its diplomacy to securing from the tribunal when it should reassemble a decision adverse to the "indirect claims." They did not wish to withdraw those claims, but were willing the tribunal should reject them, thus establishing by that high authority that a neutral power for the mere non-performance of neutral duties should not be liable for that class of claims. That the United States did so direct its diplomacy is apparent from the following letter from Sir Edward Thornton, the English minister then resident in this city, to Lord Granville, the British minister of foreign affairs, written just before the reassembling of the tribunal:

Mr. Fish said that the United States were quite as much interested as Great Britain in obtaining from the tribunal a decision adverse to those claims. * * * Mr. Fish told me that Mr. Adams left New York for England on the 24th instant, and that on his arrival there he would convince your lordship, though unofficially, that he [Mr. Adams] was entirely opposed to the principle of claims for consequential damages.—Papers, &c., volume 2, page 482.

Mr. Adams was the arbitrator on the part of the United States, and it seems, after unofficially convincing his lordship, and thus preserving the arbitration, he officially decided against these claims.

If further proof be necessary that the United States consented to the disallowance of these claims, it may be found in a letter from Minister Schenck to Lord Granville, written also just before the tribunal assembled. (Schenck to Earl Granville, volume 2, page 478:)

The United States insist that they are entitled to a decision as to each class of claims, * * * but the United States have not desired or expected any award of compensation from Great Britain for the indirect damages. They have ever been free to admit in advance that it would have been better for the future advantage and interest of nations generally that the judgment of the arbitrators should be adverse to that class of claims. * * * It is important * * * that every question in regard to such claims should be solemnly considered and passed upon.

Thus you should clearly see the reason why the President may be able to agree not to press for a money award on claims, * * * while he refuses to withdraw them.

And again:

In the correspondence I have gone as far as prudence would allow in intimating that we neither desired nor expected any pecuniary award, and that we should be content with an award that a State is not liable in pecuniary damages for the indirect results of a failure to observe its neutral obligations. It is not the interest of a country situate as are the United States * * * to have it established that a nation is liable in damages for the indirect, remote, or consequential results of a failure to observe its neutral duties.—Papers, &c., volume 2, page 476.

Now, Mr. Speaker, from the foregoing it must be clear that in order to establish the desired rule of international law and save the arbitration—when Great Britain, alarmed at the magnitude of these claims, threatened to break away from it—our Government, making a virtue of necessity, yielded this point and acquiesced in their disallowance, though it might have insisted and referred the difference to the arbitrament of arms. But instead of plunging the country into war and dooming the American people again so soon—

To go in company with pain,
And fear, and bloodshed, miserable train,
It turned this necessity to glorious gain.

A gain not for individual claimants, but for the whole American people; not for the past, but for the future. It is clear that to obtain a right construction of the three rules and at the same time save the country from war these "indirect claims" were sacrificed; were deliberately thrown overboard in order to get into port with any kind of an award under the treaty.

Nor was this to the discredit of our Government, for the reason that the United States was at Geneva upon her own business, and not upon the business of individual claimants? The Government did at Geneva what it thought was for the best interests of our American nationality; not alone for those who had suffered from the insurgent cruisers, nor for them any more than for every other class of American citizens, but for all alike. And not only for this generation, but for the generations to come.

Now, in view of the foregoing facts, who will say that the United States is under any less obligation to those citizens whose claims were presented at Geneva and disallowed, than to those citizens whose claims were allowed? She used all these claims to serve her own purposes, as she had a perfect right to do, abandoning some and insisting upon others, as her interests prompted, and out of the whole, in the expressive language of Sir Alexander Cockburn in Rustomjee vs. The Queen, "received a sum of money in order to do justice to certain of her citizens to whom injustice would otherwise be done," for the reason that as individuals they were wholly remediless.

Out of this fund the Government has already done "justice" to the insurance companies and to those suffering direct losses from the "inculpated cruisers." She has made those two classes of claimants whole; and there is still left enough of this fund to do "justice" to those who suffered from the "exculpated cruisers" and those who paid "war premiums"—just about enough to make them whole. Shall this be done and history furnished the fact that every one of our citizens who suffered losses from these Anglo-rebel corsairs were made whole out of the Geneva award? Or shall we refuse these two last classes because, in order to make other important points under the treaty, our Government abandoned these claims at Geneva, and pay the money to the insurance companies, as some advise, or, as others advise, leave it in the Treasury?

The claim of the insurance companies has been fully considered and disposed of; and, sir, he who thinks this money can be kept in the Treasury and these losers turned away empty-handed misunderstands alike his own judgment and the conscience of the American people. Shall we pay this money to these losers? Of course they have no legal claim against the Government any more than those had who have already been paid. Their claim rests wholly upon moral grounds. They can only appeal to the justice of the Government; and it is a principle of public law that where the Government is able and the case one of special hardship the Government will grant relief even out of her Treasury for losses sustained by an act of war. Here the money is not to be taken from the Treasury, but from a fund obtained in the adjustment of these very losses.

Very briefly, what are the merits of these claims? Of those suffering from the "exculpated cruisers," the case of the Delphine, built and owned at Bangor, Maine, may be taken as a representative one. She was burned by the Shenandoah December 29, 1864, before that vessel reached Melbourne. During the capture the Shenandoah carried the English flag, but displayed the confederate flag while the vessel was burning. The claim for the Delphine was disallowed at Geneva on the ground that it was not sufficiently shown that the English Government had notice of the warlike character of the Shenandoah before she sailed from London on the 8th of October previous. But while at Melbourne the British Government had such notice that after she left that port Great Britain was held for the damage she did.

The Delphine was worth, say, $1,000,000, and was uninsured. Now, every one will say there ought to be some way to indemnify her owner who by her loss was made a poor man, and no one will say that the moral obligation of the United States to do so is any less because Great Britain escaped the payment of this claim. This case seems to be one of peculiar hardship, and appeals powerfully to the generosity of the Government, but probably not more so than every other claim of this class which makes up the total of $1,200,000. Hardly less meritorious is the claim of those ship-owners who paid "war premiums" to the insurance companies.

The moment it was known in commercial circles that these insurgent cruisers were afloat, no vessel carrying the American flag could obtain a pound of freight unless it was insured against capture, which of course came out of the owner of the vessel, as did also the war risk upon the vessel itself. These "war premiums" were at one time as high as 10 per cent. upon a voyage of three months, thus aggregating 40 per cent. per annum. The total amount of these premiums is almost $9,000,000. Ship-owners were compelled to pay these premiums, or let their ships rot by the wharves, or dispose of them to foreign flags at the price of the purchasers.

Some of these owners, with a pride natural and at the same time honorable to the American citizen, clung to their vessels and paid these premiums till insolvency overtook them. Others were driven into the guano and rice and other low-cost traffic, and, after maintaining for a time the unequal contest, accepted the situation and sold for what they could get.

As the result 715 vessels, with a tonnage of 480,682 tons, were transferred from the American to the British flag alone during the four years of the war, and probably an equal or greater number were transferred to other flags, so that at the close of the war our carrying trade, once respectable, was practically destroyed. In 1860 more than two-thirds of the foreign commerce of New York was carried by American ships. In 1863, as the result of three years of war, less than one-fourth was carried under our own flag, and over three-fourths under foreign flags. And yet the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who represents in part the locality furnishing these facts and to whom they ought to be known, a day or two since denied that the decline in American shipping was traceable to the war, and laid it to the tariff. He also denied that there had been any revival of our shipping interests since the war, which also needs correction. Though not as great as could be desired, there has been actual improvement.

In 1870 but 1,452,226 tons of freight in our foreign export and import trade were carried by American ships, while in 1880, 3,128,374 tons were moved upon American bottoms—a small but a certain improvement.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I venture the statement that no nation was ever yet great in maritime triumphs that did not protect her shipping when once created, as well as help it into existence. An efficient merchant marine is undoubtedly of great importance to any nation. It is a certain source of wealth and power, and yet it is the most helpless species of property known to the law, and for this reason it is the object of special protection with every nation that has ever yet risen to greatness on the deep.

Just now every one is deploring the insignificance of our ocean-carrying trade, compared with the magnitude of that trade itself and our own great share in the commerce of the world.

Gentlemen may talk here about the tariff, but before the American people will put their money into ships and send them down to encounter all the perils of the deep, you will not find them talking about the tariff, but they do want to know what the policy of the Government is to be toward that class of property when once those ships are afloat. They want to know whether in case of war the Government will be not only able but willing to protect her shipping interests, and whether if those interests be destroyed the Government is to turn a deaf ear to the losers, or whether they will deal liberally, at least justly, with this class of investors; at least, that is what these men whose ships were taken from them by these insurgent cruisers want to know before they will be likely to reinvest in this class of property.

Now, assuming that it has been clearly shown that Congress has rightful authority over the balance of the Geneva award, that it is free from all legal or further moral claim by the insurance companies, and that all other classes of claimants have been justly dealt with, who will say that what remains of that award ought not to be distributed among those claimants still before us whose property was destroyed or taken from them by the public enemy?

It must be admitted that the questions growing out of the distribution of this fund, new as they were to our people, have been perplexing ones. In fact, differing views have been held and are still held by the ablest men in both branches of Congress, as may be seen by the various majority and minority reports upon the subject and by the several votes of the two Houses. But for one, sir, my mind is clear. I am in favor, upon what I conceive to be plain principles of justice no less than a sound public policy, of making every one of our citizens who suffered loss from these insurgent cruisers whole so far as this fund will do it.

If this is to be done it should be done without further delay. Almost ten years have elapsed since the award was made, and the public mind has tired of the subject; some journals, of no mean influence either, even advocating the return of the money to Great Britain as the honorable way out of the dilemma in which Congress has thus far felt itself involved. And if Congress would not establish the impression that it is unequal to the disposition of this question, it should act at once.

The Geneva arbitration and award mark an epoch in history. It furnished the spectacle of two great powers appearing in court and settling by peaceful means a serious national dispute, far more serious than has been the cause of many a vindictive and bloody war. And most fittingly has the capital of that little European republic, which was honored as the seat of this international tribunal, placed a memorial tablet commemorative of the event in the chamber of the Hotel D'Ville where its sessions were held.

It only remains for the American Congress to make such a just and wise distribution of the money there awarded as shall becomingly complete this important passage in our history.

Mr. WILLITS. Mr. Speaker, I oppose the bill presented by the majority of the committee. If I believed that the contest at Geneva was between nations simply, involving simply national questions, I should vote to keep this money in the Treasury, every dollar of it, and stand up and be counted in favor of that proposition every time. If I believed that this money had been obtained by this Government without any obligation to pay it to somebody, I should vote to keep it in the Treasury. The Government is rightfully in possession of this money. All parties concede that. If it was sued for as a nation, for national purposes only; if it was paid by Great Britain to the nation for national purposes only, it is held by the nation today for national purposes, and let us keep every dollar of it in the Treasury for national purposes.

It is said by one side that the insurance companies ought not to receive any of this money for the reason that they got their pay in war premiums before the vessels were destroyed. On the other hand it is shown conclusively that the owners of the vessels have got their full pay; first, the part insured from the insurance companies, and the balance in full from the fund under the act of 1874.

Now, on the other hand, the insurance companies insist that the men who paid the war premiums got their consideration as the time went along whether their vessels floated safely or not; got their consideration in the fact that their property was insured; got their consideration as much as I got the consideration in paying the premium on my policy of life insurance last year, though I did not die during the year; and for the reason that I had an assurance that if I died within the year there would be a sum left for my family.

So there seems to be nobody, according to the varied statements which are made in reference to this award, who has not been paid in full except the United States Government. The poor Government, as you might say; the Government is a loser all around. It has been a great sufferer and yet not a dollar of money derived from this award has gone into the Treasury of the United States Government for the Government. Now, I repeat that if I believed that this fund is held by the Government for no person, let us keep it in the Treasury because the Government has been the principal loser. If it is true as the majority claim that there is no obligation on the part of the Government to pay this fund in any direction, then I say again the best thing we can do is to keep it for ourselves.

But, Mr. Speaker, the discussion of this question from 1873 down to the present time has been based upon the assumption that this money does belong to somebody besides the United States Government; and if that be true it is no question of grace, it is no question of favor, to pay it over to the persons to whom it does properly belong. It is the duty of the Government, it is the obligation of the Government, to do it, and not a mere favor, not a mere act of grace, as claimed by the gentlemen who have preceded me. If you mean by favor, if you mean by grace, that we have no legal right to sue the Government, that we have no way of enforcing our claim against the Government, I grant you in that sense of the word it is a favor; but it is a right every man ought to have to get his just dues from the Government in some way or other. That much he is entitled to from all governments. It is no favor. Again, Mr. Speaker, it is not quite true, as was stated yesterday—it is not true as I understand it was stated—that in the treaty of Washington of 1871 private claims cease to have any existence. It is not true.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WILLITS. Not now. It is not true that in that treaty nothing but national claims were considered. It is not true that these claims were held, were used simply and purely to get the national damages claimed.

Now I will hear the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUMPHREY. My statement was in substance that in the treaty of Washington, under article 12 of that treaty, claims on account of private citizens were to be allowed, or otherwise disposed of. But under the first article of the treaty the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims" were the foundation upon which the Geneva arbitration was based in disposing of the question of damages done to the nation for the great national wrong done her.

Mr. WILLITS. The distinction between the two classes of claims is perfectly marked. Those under article 12 were claims such as had been a subject of settlement for years under international law as it previously existed. Here was a new class of claims, private claims nevertheless, just as much private as the others were, but having a new element of facts in them that rendered it necessary there should be some basis on which they could be adjusted.

Now, I say, Mr. Speaker, it is not true, as I understand it, that these claims were used simply for the purpose of settling a national question. They were not used simply as a yardstick to measure damages due to the nation as such. Why, Mr. Speaker, from the very first these claims had been filed in the office of the Secretary of State, and for years and years were the animating principle that inspired the Government in making this very treaty. It is true that under the Johnson-Stanley treaty nothing but private claims was involved. It is true also that under the Johnson-Clarendon treaty nothing but private claims was involved. Yet they were involved nationally just as much under those two as under this of 1871, in this respect: that the Government presented them because no private citizen of the United States could make a claim for any such thing against the Government of Great Britain; he had to do it by and through his own national government; and therefore they were national, they were just as much a national claim in the Johnson-Stanley and the Johnson-Clarendon treaties as they were in the Washington treaty.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Was not that the reason the Senate rejected the Johnson-Clarendon treaty?

Mr. WILLITS. I am coming to that. The Senate did not reject it because it was a treaty for private claims. They rejected it—and Mr. Sumner expressly urged that it should be rejected—because the treaty was simply for private claims, and he insisted it should be for national claims besides. That is it exactly.

Mr. Sumner spoke against that treaty in his celebrated speech of April 13, 1869. He opposed it on the following grounds:

First. Because it contained no apology for England's insults and injury to the United States.

That was national. That was not in the Johnson-Clarendon treaty. That had nothing to do with the question of damages; did not in any way interfere with or include the question of private rights at all.

Second. That it made no provision for the adjustment of the national claim for damages.

Not because the claim for private damages "as a whole as a national loss" was not included in the treaty by any means, as stated yesterday by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED.] And that is the distinction the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has not properly made. It was because the treaty did not provide for the claim for our own national damages and not because the private claims were not made national. Mr. Sumner did not object at all to the treaty because the private claims had not been made national—not at all; but because the treaty did not include any claim for the damages to the United States itself. Further:

Third. That it recognized no rule of international duty applicable to such cases, or, to state it in his own words, "England simply proposes to submit the question of liability for individual losses to an anomalous tribunal where chance plays its part. This is all. Nothing is admitted even on this question; no rule for the future is established; while nothing is said of the indignity to the nation, nor of damages to the nation."

Nothing of the indignity to the nation nor of damages to the nation. Mr. Sumner added:

On an earlier occasion it was otherwise.

Now, what did we do? It was very manifest that the Johnson-Clarendon treaty was not broad enough. It did not include the national question. No objection was made because it did include the individual losses. What did we do? We made provision first for a treaty which had in it an expression of regret and apology. That was one point that Mr. Sumner wanted. Next we provided for an arbitration of national as well as private claims. There were national claims for damages as well as private claims for damages. Then the treaty established the three rules.

As I said before, the treaty as made provided for and saved the individual claims just as fully as the Johnson-Clarendon treaty did; so that it was simply a question of national claims not being included rather than of private claims not being included in the right manner.

The treaty was made, and our Government gave some construction to it; and perhaps it is as fair a way of determining what construction they gave to it as we can find to read the notices that were given by the Government to the various claimants. I will not read the whole of the notices, but simply enough to indicate what the point is, and will print the whole in my speech.

Under date of September 22, 1865, the following notice was issued:

Citizens of the United States having claims against foreign governments not founded on contract, which may have originated since the 8th February, 1853, will, without any delay which can be avoided, forward to this Department statements of the same, under oath, accompanied by the proper proof.

Starting right out with a recognition of claims against foreign governments. The reason is, because private individuals could not make any claim against foreign governments directly, but had to do it through our own Government.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but I would like to ask him this question: If a citizen of this Government could have a claim against England in this case for want of due diligence on her part, if there was any claim whatever, was it not necessary that this Government as a sovereign Government must make it as a government, and did not the claim exist in favor of this Government, and not in favor of any private individual growing out of this want of due diligence?

Mr. WILLITS. I say that he would have a claim in the future; in the past he did not have any such right. Until the three rules were adopted, as I shall attempt to establish when I get to that point, he had no such right. But now, under the three rules as they have now become international law, he would have a claim just as much as the Government would have a claim against the foreign government. That is now international law. But before those three rules were adopted the individual had no right, because such a right had not been incorporated into international law. The point is this: whether private claims were not in this last treaty still held as a separate class.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Once more, and I will not interrupt the gentleman again. I understand that the three rules have simply determined this—and under the Geneva award it is now a matter of international law—that each nation is bound to use due diligence in a case similar to that which arose in the late war, and if it does not do so it is bound to the government which is injured by the want of such due diligence.

Mr. WILLITS. That is the law in relation to the future. But before those three rules were established individual claimants had no law upon which they could base their claims as they now have under these three rules. After the treaty was passed in September, 1871, this notice was given to claimants by the State Department:

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the —— instant, and its inclosures. In reply, I inclose a copy of the treaty concluded with Great Britain on the 8th of May last, and general instructions as to the proof of claims prepared for the use of claimants in the absence of rules by the tribunal which may pass upon the claims.

Mr. BRIGGS. Did not the treaty embrace other claims besides those covered by the Geneva award, in a separate article?

Mr. WILLITS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. And did not the notice refer to those claimants?

Mr. WILLITS. No, sir. I will read further:

In the absence of rules, and in anticipation of the action of the tribunal, this Department cannot assume to determine what claims it may or may not be proper to prefer under the first eleven articles of the treaty, nor to direct what form or extent of proof will be necessary to establish them, nor the effect of insurance upon the question of right of compensation. * * * Persons desiring to lodge claims in the Department for that purpose are requested to do so without delay, in such form and sustained by such proofs as they may be advised or think proper to rest their claims upon.

The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIGGS] will see that the notice was for claims under the first eleven articles, not under the twelfth, as the gentleman supposed. All through there was this question kept separate, this idea that there were private claims to be referred as such to the Geneva tribunal, not as a question of national loss but as a question of individual loss. And all through the correspondence the question of claims bristles in and on and over it all; it was a question of private claims as well as national, and private claims of a different character from those mentioned in article 12 of the treaty.

Before they got through there was nothing but individual claims left; everything else had been excluded. Everything that was national had been eliminated before they got through, and it came down to a question of private claims, just as much as it was under the Clarendon treaty.

That being so, and these claims having been presented by our Government, I say that in my judgment there is an obligation upon this Government to pay the parties for whom claims were presented. And notwithstanding what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUMPHREY] said yesterday I believe, and it is so in the record, that the award was to be an indemnity to the sufferers and losers by the acts of the confederate cruisers. It was an indemnity given to the nation; the award was to be paid to the United States it is true, but it was an award with which the United States was to compensate the persons who had suffered losses.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Once more, if you please. The claim which we made against England was that she had committed an act of war against this Government. And when we received the $15,500,000 we received it as an indemnity for the wrong done to us as a nation, just as much as if we had fought battles with England and had received the amount after such a war.

Mr. WILLITS. Everything the Government of the United States claimed as a nation was rejected, and nothing was allowed by the Geneva tribunal except what was given to us for individuals and as an indemnity to individuals. That being so, if it be true that the claims were allowed to be paid in the first instance to the Government of the United States, as I concede was done, then I think there is a moral obligation resting upon us which will sustain the legal right of the parties to the award that was given for them.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Only once more. Not every claim of the Government was rejected, but simply that part of the claim of the Government which was for speculative and indirect damages.

Mr. WILLITS. Everything that was national was rejected, and I will come to that before we get through.

Mr. HUMPHREY. They were all national.

Mr. WILLITS. We had $15,500,000 given to us under that award. By the act of 1874 we paid away part of it to the owners of vessels, over and above what they had been insured, and in other ways, until the amount was reduced to about $9,000,000. The question now is, What shall we do with that amount?

There were 129 vessels destroyed. Of those 129 vessels 89 had been insured and 40 were not insured. The owners of the 40 vessels which were uninsured have been paid in full. The owners of the 89 vessels which were insured have been paid, under the act of 1874, out of the award, the full amount and value of their vessels as proved, less the insurance money obtained from the insurance companies. Therefore the owners of the vessels have got their pay in full, partly from the insurance companies and partly out of this fund. Now, what shall we do with the balance?

Let us look briefly at the facts in the case. During the late civil war the confederacy equipped armies and with them destroyed hundreds of millions of the property of individuals on land; equipped a navy and did great injury on the high seas to the property of individuals. Primarily neither class had any remedy. It is one of the sad incidents of war that no nation can compensate such losses. But in this case of the injury on the sea, an element existed that did not on the land. This confederate navy was not equipped from its own ports. It was claimed that Great Britain, a neutral nation, had connived at its equipment in her ports, or had neglected her duties as a neutral, whereby this navy obtained power and means to injure us; that she had contributed to and was in a great measure responsible for its existence and success. We claimed that she was the cause of the great damage, and she must pay for it. Of this we gave her due notice from time to time.

After we had closed the war we took up the question of the responsibility of Great Britain for this great damage. We set our diplomacy to work, and in the mean time we proceeded to make up our little bill. It became necessary to know what had been destroyed, who had been injured, and to what extent. So notice was given to all parties to present their claims for damages. There was no guarantee that in the event of an award all should be paid. All were to be presented by our Government. There was no attempt to discriminate between them or to pass judgment on their equities or merits. Great stress is laid by some upon the fact that a list of these claims was tabulated in the State Department; and that in this list were included the claims of insurers and others, as though this fact alone was a recognition of their claim for payment out of the fund. We guaranteed nothing, neither did we recognize the validity of any one's claims. These claims individually and collectively were to be presented to Great Britain for payment, and if she paid them individually they would be satisfied, and if not they were to go without their pay. If she paid them all to the United States, there would be an implied provision that we were to pay all the claimants, at least what was fairly their due. If she paid only part, those rejected from the necessity of the case could not claim the money paid to or for the successful.

The result was that everybody considering himself injured put in his claim—owners of vessels, of freights, of cargoes, mortgagees, seamen for their wages and personal effects, passengers for their baggage and for detention, underwriters, and those who had paid the enhanced insurance or war premiums; a consul put in a claim for loss of office, $10,000; and a harpooner for personal injury, $7,000; in fact everything that could be chargeable directly or indirectly was received and tabulated in due form, and the grand aggregate constituted the sum total of the damages claimed. Even the United States put in her claim of over $7,000,000 for expenses in pursuit of the cruisers, with bills, vouchers, and orders, all certified to by George M. Robeson, Secretary of the Navy; this last was the national money damage directly resulting from the operations of the cruisers.

These claims were all for money, duly listed, accompanied by proofs more or less complete, and formed a grand aggregate of some $26,000,000, exclusive of interest, which if added would bring the claim up to about $35,000,000. In addition to the claims so listed the United States made claims to great damages, not capable of being definitely estimated, and for which no specific amount was demanded, but which were as real as those capable of being tabulated, to wit, (1,) "the loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag;" (2,) "the prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion." For these two claims the United States asked compensation and remuneration as much as for the other three, which were (1) "the claim for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the insurgent cruisers;" (2,) "the national expenditure in the pursuit of those cruisers;" (3,) "the enhanced payments of insurance." And why not? They were as substantial; and the amount was so much larger if calculated in dollars and cents that the itemized bill dwindled into insignificance in comparison. This was the account stated in part with a bill of particulars and in part ad damnum, with the qualification that there was money in it.

These were the accounts made out under the treaty and claimed under it—all made possible and none excluded by it. There were some things settled by the treaty that did not go to the board of arbitration. England had early in the war recognized the confederacy as a belligerent. This she had a right to do, as an independent nation, even under the laws of neutrality. It was a matter in her own discretion and of itself was not a casus belli. Still our Government remonstrated against it, and for it we had a grievance. That act had given nationality to the rebellion and had sent a thrill of joy and had added assurance to the hopes of a rebellion that had assumed grave proportions. Because in part the Johnson-Clarendon treaty of 1869 had made no provision for this, as we thought, gross insult to us as a nation, it was rejected by the Senate. The balm was administered in the treaty of Washington, in an apology on the part of Great Britain for the insult. It is claimed that for this apology the United States bartered away some of the rights of its citizens.

Not so. The treaty of Washington rendered possible the five claims made under it, and without it they could not have been considered at all, and obtained the apology besides. Nothing was bartered away, except perhaps the indefinite claim for money damages for the added years of the war caused by the recognition of belligerency. For this we accepted the apology, and no private rights were curtailed by it. This injury was national, and no private claimant has just cause of complaint that it was not assessed in damages. Now, what did we gain by the treaty? A forum and a law to adjust claims for damages caused by the confederate cruisers. Bear in mind that before that treaty there was no recognized law giving damages for such an injury. Nothing short of war could enforce them. The confederacy had collapsed so that the immediate cause of the injury could not respond in damages, and England, the remote cause, utterly denied all liability for them.

The law of nations had made no provision for such a state of facts. History had chronicled no such a rebellion. Law was silent on the peculiar phases presented by it. And yet our Government said England ought to pay. England repudiated the claim. Formulated, the propositions were as follows.

On the part of the United States by Mr. Seward:

> Upon these principles of law and these assumptions of fact, the United States do insist and must continue to insist that the British Government is justly responsible for the damages which the peaceful, law-abiding citizens of the United States sustain by the depredations of the Alabama.

On the part of Great Britain by Earl Russell:

> Her majesty's government cannot, therefore, admit that they are under any obligation whatever to make compensation to United States citizens on account of the proceedings of that vessel.

In this condition of affairs it is plain there was slight chance for compensation. There was a dispute about the law, and a law had to be made which England would recognize. Finally about nine years' persistent diplomacy resulted in the treaty of Washington, which gave the forum and the law. Fault is found with the law, because under it some claims were allowed and some were rejected. Suffice to answer that it was made by two equal parties and had to have the assent of both. But let us examine it—that part that bears upon the point in issue.

What did we gain by the treaty? And here I come to the point suggested in the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HUMPHREY,] whether before the treaty these claimants had any claim against Great Britain. I insist that they had not; that there was no law under which the claims could be made; that under the treaty we got the law by which the claimants obtained a status in an international court.

Mr. HUMPHREY. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment? We claimed as a nation that before the treaty we had a claim upon Great Britain. We claimed that under the foreign-enlistment act of England, which was enacted as much for our benefit as our foreign-enlistment act was enacted for hers, there was a tacit understanding that England was bound to use due diligence, as she had called upon us to use due diligence in similar circumstances. We had performed our duty in this respect during three wars in which she had been engaged; and she was bound as a matter of international law to pursue the same policy toward us.

Mr. WILLITS. We claimed all along that these three rules were the law, but Great Britain had denied it; that was the difficulty. The principle had to be incorporated as a part of the international law, and not until these three rules were adopted was there any basis for any such claim.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Oh, yes; Great Britain insisted that we should enforce our foreign-enlistment act for her benefit, but she refused to enforce hers for our benefit.

Mr. WILLITS. I understand that; but she denied the legal principle. I will show as I go along that this was a point England had never conceded until the treaty was made. It is only under the treaty that any of these men could get a dollar. And they never could have obtained anything under section 12 of the treaty, because that section simply recognizes claims such as had been recognized by international law prior to that time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. They never have obtained and never will obtain, as private individuals, a dollar under this treaty.

Mr. WILLITS. We are going to try to give some of this money to them.

Now, what did we gain by the treaty? We gained a forum and a law which did not exist before—a forum and a law to adjust claims for damages caused by the confederate cruisers.

The question is about the three rules—what they established and what they did not establish. Article 6 of the treaty provided—

In deciding the matters submitted to the arbitrators they shall be governed by the following three rules, which are agreed upon by the high contracting parties as rules to be taken as applicable to the case, and by such principles of international law—

Recognizing the fact that these three rules had not yet obtained as international law—not inconsistent therewith as the arbitrators shall determine to have been applicable to the case.

Now, what are these rules?

First. To use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping, within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace—

Was not that right? Was not that what we had always claimed the law ought to be? The exculpated cruiser cannot find any fault with that; the war-premium man cannot justly find any fault with it; the insurance man has no right to find any fault with it. That is good law, and it ought to be incorporated as a part of the international law—and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted in whole or in part within such jurisdiction to warlike use.

That is good law; nobody ought to dispute that.

Secondly. Not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms, or the recruitment of men.

Thirdly. To exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and as to all persons within its jurisdiction to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

Her Britannic majesty has commanded her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries to declare that her majesty's government cannot assent to the foregoing rules as a statement of principles of international law which were in force at the time when the claims mentioned in article 1 arose, but that her majesty's government, in order to evince its desire of strengthening the friendly relations between the two countries, and of making satisfactory provision for the future, agrees that, in deciding the questions between the two countries arising out of those claims, the arbitrators should assume that her majesty's government had undertaken to act upon the principles set forth in these rules.

It was thus expressly declared that the Government of Great Britain did not concede that these rules had been in force at the time the claims arose; but she concedes them for the purposes of this case as the law; by agreement they were made the law so far as this case was concerned.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The law of this case.

Mr. WILLITS. Yes, the law of this case; and it became the law under which every man filed his claim, and under which the adjudication was made; and without the law as thus conceded he would have had no valid claim at all.

These are the three rules that were to govern in this case and were to be the law in the future between the two governments, who agreed also to endeavor to have them incorporated as a part of the law of nations. Are they not right and just to all parties? No one claimed that England had taken up arms against us, or made herself a public enemy by her course. The complaint was against her as a friendly nation, that she had not exercised due diligence in the matter of the confederate cruisers. These rules agree upon a standard of liability for the government of neutrals, and declare what kind of negligence shall subject them to liability for damages. They were more severe upon neutrals than pre-existing international law, otherwise Great Britain would not have resisted them. Admitting the fact that Great Britain had not exercised due diligence, she agreed to pay. If she had exercised it, then she was not to pay. Was not that right?

If she had had reasonable ground to believe a confederate vessel was being fitted out in her ports, she agreed that she ought to have prevented it, and on failure to do so, she should pay resulting damages. If she did not have that reasonable ground for belief, ought she to pay? We think all fair-minded men will assent to the proposition that she ought not to, even those claimants who suffered by the exculpated cruisers. It all depends upon the knowledge and culpability, upon the reasonable ground for belief and due diligence, all questions of fact which were submitted by the arbitration. If the facts showed no "reasonable ground of belief," also showed "due diligence" on the part of Great Britain, as to the exculpated cruisers, by what rule of law or justice can those injured by them complain?

On the other hand, the rules did not assume to change the rule of damages, or the measure of damages. This was all left to the principles of international law, which in this regard is much the same as at common law. The right to claim damages for a cause not hitherto recognized by international law was conceded, but the rule of damages, which is common to all law, and has obtained in international as a principle hoary with age, was to govern in this case, to wit, that remote and indirect damages are not subject to assessment. If our friends who claim for "war premiums" are dissatisfied with the rejection of their claims they should mourn over the character of those claims rather than swear at the court for invoking a principle that inheres in all sound jurisprudence.

Even our friends who lost by the exculpated cruisers could not have been benefited if these rules had not been adopted. Without these rules they had no right that they could adjudicate—no recognized claim. If under these three rules it turns out that their claims were rejected because Great Britain had exercised due diligence, these men cannot find any fault with the treaty. Nothing had been bartered away.

Mr. HUMPHREY. May I interrupt the gentleman again?

Mr. WILLITS. I beg the gentleman to excuse me. I would like to yield; but I must hasten to a conclusion.

Again, if you will examine those three rules, as I before stated, and I wish to emphasize this point, you will see that the rule of damages has not been changed at all. The question involved in the three rules is simply the question of the culpability or the diligence of Great Britain.

But the measure of damages is not in any of the three rules. How are these damages to be measured, by what rule, by what law? Not by the three rules, because they do not mention it. By the international law, and the basis of international law is the common law in reference to the measure of damages. The sixth article says "that all the principles of international law not inconsistent with these three rules shall be applicable to the case."

Now, under the common law there is no measure for indirect, remote, consequential damages, none whatever.

Mr. HUMPHREY. There is for consequential damages.

Mr. WILLITS. Not for remote and indirect damages at any rate. When you come to look at these claims alongside of the treaty and international law every man who filed his claim knew it had to be subjected to the principles of international law in reference to the measure of damages. There are some damages which are not the subject of assessment, and the court found in this case there were some of these claims which under the measure of damages laid down by the international law had to be rejected. [Mr. HUMPHREY rose.] The gentleman must excuse me. I have not time to yield to further interruption.

Mr. HUMPHREY. They were consequential as against Great Britain, but they were direct as against the confederate government.

Mr. WILLITS. They were all indirect, those that were rejected. Only direct damages have ever been assessed and allowed.

But there is another statement to which I will refer. I find in this report of the committee, (and I will say this for the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that he has made by far the ablest report on his side of the question which, as I believe, has ever been made in any Congress of the United States)—I find he has fallen, as I think, into this error, that the court of arbitration rejected the war-premium men rightly and justly—he concedes that. I think so, too—but he gives these reasons for it, and I ask the Clerk to read from the report of the committee the passage which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

First. It is said that the tribunal rejected the war-premium claim as indirect; therefore Congress should do so. This objection is disposed of when the fact is once clear in the mind that the Geneva tribunal was deciding a case "between nations," while Congress has to decide a case between individuals. The tribunal was right in rejecting war premiums eo nomine, because they were not a national loss, not (to use their language) "damages between nations."

When the ship-owner paid a war premium to the Atlantic Mutual, the ship-owner lost and the Atlantic Mutual gained, but the country neither lost nor gained. Hence, as between nations there was no damage. But Congress has to decide, not between nations, but between ship-owner and insurer. And when you add to the fact that the ship-owner paid and the company received the other fact that the company made hundreds of thousands more than it paid out, it would seem clear, on principles connected with the four rules of arithmetic, that of the two the ship-owner lost.

Mr. WILLITS. It is manifest that statement in the report of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary indicates that that position is in one sense vital to their case. There must be some reason other than the ordinary reason, based upon acknowledged principles of law, assigned for the rejection of those claims, and in order to avoid the point that under the treaty those war-premium claims were not admissible because indirect.

Let us look at this. I am inclined to think this theory "will not wash." What did the tribunal say on the subject? I will read it. The tribunal, when it rendered its judgment, said as follows:

First, the loss in transfer of the American merchant-marine to the British flag.

That is one of our claims.

Second, enhanced payment of insurance.

That was another.

Third, prolongation of the war and addition of a large sum to the cost of the war for the suppression of the rebellion.

That was the third.

They have arrived individually and collectively at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, on the principle of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations, and should on such principles be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making an award.

There were three claims rejected by this judgment, all in the same category, and each one of them upon the same ground, and not upon the ground assigned by the gentleman, but on the ground that under the principles of international law they could not be considered.

Mr. REED. As between nations.

Mr. WILLITS. Because it was between nations, and I would like to know where you get international law except as between nations. All were in the same category.

Now, let us look at them. The gentleman says because the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company received $100 from the ship-owner it was simply a question between individuals, and the country neither lost nor gained. How was it with the other two cases? The loss of transfer of the American merchant-marine to the British flag was rejected for the same reason. Was not that a loss to the country? Was it not a national loss? Did we not put it in as a claim and assert that it was a national loss? It was a loss to the nation, yet it was rejected for the same reason as the war-premium claim which was rejected, as he alleges, because it was a loss between individuals. His claim was rejected for the same reason that the nation's was—because it was indirect.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield to me for an interruption?

Mr. WILLITS. I would rather not. My time is nearly out, and you will have an opportunity again.

Again, the claim as to the prolongation of the war and the additional cost of the war, thereby necessitated for the suppression of the rebellion, was rejected for the same reason. Both of these claims were rejected because they were for indirect damages, indirect losses, which could not under international law be specifically assessed.

But the gentleman says that this question in reference to the enhanced insurance was rejected because it was not a national loss. Unfortunately for the gentleman's argument, the court did not say so in rejecting it. Let us see what the record says when they came to enter judgment in reference to the cases.

Count Sclopis, on entering up the judgment in reference to that question, on behalf of the arbitrators then declared:

That the several claims for indirect losses mentioned in the statement made by the agent of the United States on the 25th instant, and referred to in the statement just made by the agent of her Britannic majesty, are, and from henceforth shall be, wholly excluded from the judgment of the tribunal, and directed the secretary to embody this declaration in the protocol of this day's proceedings.

These several claims so excluded were the same three claims I have just spoken of.

Indirect damages and indirect losses were rejected because they were indirect, and for no other reason. And when the parties filed their claims they knew they were to be subjected to the priciples of international law.

But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment on one other point here in this connection before I leave this portion of the case. It is claimed that in these three rules—it was claimed first that in the adoption of the three rules we bartered away something. They fail, however, to show what we bartered away. Next they claim that when we came to file our cases we bartered them away. It was stated by one of the attorneys in an argument before the committee for the claimants that—

The United States attempted to get law and to get money. It had claims all for money; and it bartered away some of these claims for law and on the others got the money.

Now, there is nothing in this record that indicates such a thing; but if it were true that the Government was so mean as to barter away the claims of private citizens in order to get law for itself, in the name of common sense why should not the Government pay that claim which it thus bartered away from its own Treasury rather than take it from any other parties for whom the Government secured payment? But it was not true. There was no bartering at all. The rights of claimants were left just as they were before. Under the law, the court construed the claims as indirect and not assessable under the principles of international law. Now, what did they do? They rejected these three classes of claims. That left but two more.

You will see that at the time the judgment was made they did not reject the claims of the United States, individually or nationally, for the expenses incurred in pursuit of these cruisers—over $7,000,000. That was a direct claim. It was not rejected with the three classes to which I have referred for the reason that it was a claim that could be determined. You could estimate the amount of it. It was right before them; but it was rejected finally when the award was made, and for the assigned reason that it was a part of the general expenses of the war. Now, then, of the five classes of claims that were presented to the board of arbitration all were rejected but one, all three classes of national and one private—the "war premiums." Four of the classes were rejected wholly, and that left it simply a question of the assessment of the amount of the other class of private claims, the direct claim for vessels, &c., actually destroyed. So it came back after all to the Johnson-Clarendon treaty. Everything was rejected that Mr. Sumner wanted except that he got his apology.

Then the arbitration board went to work to foot up the account.

Let us look at the history of the claims which were presented to this board, as well as the character of the claims themselves. The first claim growing out of the acts of these confederate cruisers was made on the 31st day of January, 1863, and was made by the New York Mutual Insurance Company of the city of New York, claiming that the ship Brilliant had been destroyed and that the company had paid the insurance policy of $9,245. The ship Manchester had also been destroyed, for which the company paid the policy of $7,500, and here was what they claimed:

Your memorialists are of the opinion that the said steamer—

That is the Alabama—

having been built and fitted out and sailed from a port in Great Britain, and her crew being composed principally of the subjects of the Government of Great Britain, she is to all intents and purposes a British vessel.

Why, here is almost, as you may say, the gist of the whole argument on the part of the United States, made in the first instance by an insurance company early in the war and immediately after the loss that was incurred.

You will find, Mr. Speaker, that all the way through from that time on the State Department was loaded with these claims on the part of the insurance companies. The fact is it is claimed not only that the insurance company was the first party who filed a claim but it is also insisted that but for the insurance companies no claim and no award would ever have been rendered. It is through the persistency and determined effort of the insurance companies that this award was made at last.

Another remarkable fact, a very remarkable one under the circumstances, is the conspicuous absence of our "war-premium" friends. Not till the diplomatic point was practically won did they appear on the scene. The first claim for "war premiums" was filed in January, 1871, eight years after the insurance company put in an appearance, and nearly six years after the war closed. What were our clamorous friends doing all this time. It is so strange that $6,245,383.39 should be lying around loose for six years without a local habitation and a name, and this, too, largely in thrifty New England. An examination of the "revised list of claims" shows that this amount of over $6,000,000 was claimed by three hundred and forty-one persons or firms, making an average of $18,341 to each.

Think of it, a Yankee skipper ranging the mighty main from icy zone to torrid suns, dickering with every people, and seducing the heathen of their very eye-teeth, out $18,000 and not send in his little bill somewhere to some one. And this for six years! Truly this is the most remarkable instance of absent-mindedness I ever read of. And then consider that there were three hundred and forty-one fellows in the same fix, all stricken with the same catalepsis. It is enough to destroy our confidence in human nature.

How do you account for that? Why because they knew in their own hearts that they had got consideration for every dollar that they had paid in the risks that had been assumed; in the fact that they could go to their beds and sleep quietly; in the fact they could rest easily, because if their vessels and cargoes were destroyed they would be compensated for them; and in the next place they believed in the principle of subrogation. They had been brought up to understand thoroughly the question of insurance. They had insured all their business lives, and they now thought there was an unquestioned right of subrogation. Again, they had assigned all their rights to those vessels under the principles of subrogation to the insurance companies when the insurance companies paid them their insurance; so that they had no claim; they did not know that they had any claim.

They did not insist on it; and for six long years six millions and more of money lay around without any claim; and at last how did they find it out? Why, some attorneys got their heads together and discovered this new principle of subrogation, to wit, that subrogation is a principle of "odds and ends, of remnants." And we have got it incorporated in the report of the majority that subrogation is a principle of "odds and ends and of remnants." And, lo and behold! here is something that is not odds and ends, that is not remnants, but is the whole garment!

Therefore the principle of subrogation does not apply. And so thereupon there was a resurrection and a life; so that this catalepsy was routed, and there has not been such a resurrection since the time of the valley of dry bones that the inspired prophet speaks of. Then these war-premium claims came to the front. Every skipper got on deck and with full sail went for this award with all the energy that John Paul Jones went for the coast of England. They had not supposed they had any right to this money, but these attorneys worked it up for them. If ever there was a case before this Congress that was worked up by attorneys and claim agents this is that case. Since I have been here from the beginning of the Forty-fifth Congress there have been three attorneys for these war-premium men to one for any other claimant. The corridors have been filled with these claimants and their attorneys.

Mr. REED. I would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan he is getting more worked up than any claims men have ever been.

Mr. WILLITS. I have a list here of attorneys who represent $4,000,000 of those claims. They worked up this case, and if ever there was a claim that was worked up energetically this one was after they had discovered this new principle of subrogation, and not before.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have given the essential points that I think ought to govern this case. I believe that the Government received this money for somebody. I believe that it can be shown, if I have not demonstrated it, that the persons entitled to it are the persons for whom the award was rendered, the persons on whose claim the award was rendered, and that in all common sense, in all the light of every principle of law, there can be no reason why persons whose claims were rejected—not rejected as being bartered away for something else, but rejected under the principles of the treaty of Washington itself, to which they subscribed and under which they filed their claims, subject to the adjudication of the board of arbitration—there can be no reason why these persons should come in here and claim money that was awarded on altogether another principle.

My proposition is this: that the tribunal at Geneva awarded damages only for property destroyed, for hulks and cargoes; that the question only was what was their value; that all other claims were rejected, except seamen's wages and other cognate claims; and that the award goes, and should go, to the owners of the vessels and cargoes, and to such other persons as had an interest therein or lien upon them, either by express agreement or by operation of law. If the insurance companies are not subrogated to the right of the owners, as is claimed by the majority report, their claims before a court would fall, and the owners would recover the money. As the owners are the same persons who paid the "war premiums," they would recover the same money as owners which they attempt to recover under the bill proposed as "war premiums;" and as their objective point is to get the money, they might well agree to go to the court, as the bill of the minority authorizes them, if they are clear that the doctrine of subrogation does not apply. Why cannot we, therefore, all agree to send the whole matter to the courts? Why do you hesitate? If the doctrine of subrogation is a doctrine of "odds and ends, of remnants," as the majority report has it; and if there are no odds and ends, no remnants, then the insurance companies take nothing by their motion. If the position of the majority is sound they risk nothing, and we settle this whole vexed question without any worry of conscience.

I have an impression, however, that our "war-premium" friends are not willing because they are not quite sure of their law. My position is that if the law gives them the money they ought to have it, and they ought to be allowed to go to court to determine their rights under the treaty and law and justice. If such a course does not give it to them, they ought not to have it; and if it gives it to the insurance companies, they ought to have it.

I firmly believe that as "war-premium" claimants they have not a shadow of right. The money was not awarded for the payment of any such persons. But as owners of the vessels and cargoes they would have primary standing in court only to be ruled out by the undoubted subrogation of the insurance companies to stand in their place. If that right of subrogation does not apply in this case, or if it is doubtful, their standing would not be impaired and their recovery would be certain. I submit the suggestion in all fairness.

I believe that the insurance companies have been subrogated to the rights of the owners of the vessels. But it is disputed on the part of our friends on the other side of this question; they say the question of subrogation does not apply.

Then I say let us submit this question to a court. This money belongs to somebody; it was given to indemnify somebody. Now, let us ascertain by the decision of a court to whom it does belong. Let us submit to that court all these claims, under the treaty, under the law, in equity; and then if the court finds that the insurance companies are entitled to it, well and good. If the court finds that, as claimed by the majority of the committee, the principle of subrogation does not obtain, then the insurance companies will lose their case. The money will then go to the owners of the vessels, and they were the men especially who paid the war premiums.

Under our bill, the bill of the minority of the committee, which provides for sending this question to a court, if the views of the majority are sustained by the court then the war-premium men will get their money. In any event I say that this question should be submitted to a court to examine the questions of law underlying the treaty of Washington and all the rights of all the parties, and to render a judgment in favor of the persons entitled to the award, with right of appeal to the Supreme Court. In this way, in my opinion, can justice best be done and the honor of the nation sustained.

[During the delivery of Mr. WILLITS'S remarks the hammer fell.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. PAYSON in the chair.) The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I move that the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended by consent. He has been frequently interrupted in the course of his remarks, and being a member of the committee who joined in the minority report I hope there will be no objection to allowing him to proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman proceeding by unanimous consent?

There was no objection.

GENEVA AWARD.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the distribution of the Geneva award.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Speaker, the subject under consideration especially concerns my constituents, and I ask the indulgence of the House while I submit some considerations touching the distribution of the money received from Great Britain in payment of the Geneva award.

There is now in the Treasury nearly ten millions of money paid to this Government by Great Britain under the Geneva award. It has been there for nearly ten years. A part of the money received was distributed to parties whose claims were acknowledged by our Government under the act of 1874; but the remainder has been allowed to stay in the Treasury until the present time because of the inability of the Government to agree upon a plan of distribution. In the controversy which has existed between the different claimants, a person here and there has been found with the boldness to suggest that the fund in dispute would better be appropriated by the Government for the current expenses of the administration; but it is to the honor of the Government generally conceded that this money is not absolutely the property of the United States, but held by them subject to a high moral obligation to consider those who suffered specially by the depredations of the rebel cruisers.

In dealing with the question before us the thought naturally arises, how happens it that there should be this surplus on hand after payment of the undisputed claims, this apparent discrepancy between the award at Geneva and the award of the commissioners under the act of 1874?

Soon after the award was made at Geneva a controversy arose as to its distribution. Different parties, whose claims were adverse, disputed each others' rights and insisted on their own, and after a protracted debate Congress passed a bill providing for the payment of certain claims which were not disputed, and postponed the consideration of the adverse and contested claims until those parties whose losses were conceded had been adjusted and paid. There is now a sum in the Treasury about equal to half the amount of the Geneva award whose ultimate ownership is in dispute, involving equities and considerations not easily adjusted, but which can only be decided by the exercise of that wise discretion which is invested in the supreme legislative authority of the nation.

It might seem, in one aspect of the case, that the award was too large. But the discrepancy which exists between the Geneva award and the award of the commissioners arose in this way: the two tribunals acted with reference to two distinct objects. The tribunal at Geneva having decided to what extent Great Britain was responsible for the depredations committed by the rebel cruisers, proceeded simply to ascertain and assess the value of the property destroyed, without regard to its ownership or the validity of the different claims, and made their award accordingly. They had nothing to do with the character of the specific claims. That was a matter to be considered by the United States when the time came to make the distribution of the sum received from the award. The work of deciding the amount of compensation for property destroyed, after the liability of England had been determined, was easy; but the work of distribution, owing to the peculiar relations in which different parties stood to this fund and the different equities involved, was attended with some difficulty.

The object was to indemnify those who were the actual losers by the depredations of the rebel cruisers. The owners of vessels and property destroyed, in making their claims, were required to deduct the amount received by them for insurance. To pay without such reduction would be to pay them twice. But it was in application of this idea of indemnity to the case of the insurance companies that the trouble arose. It was argued in behalf of insurance companies that in dealing with them the Government should not take into consideration the general result of their business of war-risks, but should deal with each case separately, and allow the insurance companies, to the extent of insurance paid, to stand in the place of the vessel-owner and receive the indemnity which otherwise he would have received. But it was decided to allow their claims only to the extent of their actual net losses, to be ascertained by striking the balance between all the losses paid and all the premiums received.

Their claims to indemnity, therefore, were limited to the amount of their net losses incurred in this branch of their business. But this principle of compensation, as applied to the insurance companies, disposed of only a small part of the award, so that after the claims of the owners of property to the extent of their actual losses, and of the insurance companies to the extent of their net losses, have been satisfied, there remains a considerable sum to be distributed to which no one has any clear title; a result which does not indicate that the sum awarded at Geneva was in excess of the amount due, but only shows that, owing to the complication and difficulties which have arisen in the course of business, it is difficult to determine who, in the most satisfactory sense, were the losers by the act of the inculpated rebel cruisers and have the strongest claims to indemnity.

This variance between the award at Geneva and the award of the commissioners under the act of 1874 is a complete answer to the assertion of the insurance companies, that in making their award the arbitrators passed on the validity of the different claims, and that it is not now an open question what claims should be allowed.

There are three classes of claimants:

First. The insurance companies, who insist that they should be subrogated to the owners of vessels destroyed, and whose losses they paid;

Second. Those who have lost by the payment of war premiums; and Third. Those who have lost by the captures of confederate cruisers, for whose conduct the English Government was held not guilty by the arbitrators at Geneva.

The amount claimed by the insurance companies is $5,500,000, without interest. The amount claimed by the war-premium men is about $6,000,000, without interest. The amount claimed by those who suffered by the acts of the exculpated cruisers is, exclusive of interest, about $1,200,000.

The collict is mainly between the war-premium men and the insurance companies, whose claims have been, again and again, rejected by both the Senate and the House.

The subject has been referred this session to the Judiciary Committee of the House, who have examined it thoroughly, and have made two reports. The majority of the committee have recommended that a court of commissioners be appointed, with authority to decide upon the proof how the money shall be divided—

First. Between those who have suffered losses by the capture and destruction of their property by the exculpated cruisers for whose acts the British Government was held not responsible; and Second. Between those who have suffered losses by the forced payment of war premiums, made necessary by the presence of rebel cruisers on the high seas.

The minority report of the committee, while repeating and enforcing the old arguments in favor of the insurance companies, based on the pretense that our Government acted as their agent or trustee in the proceedings at Geneva, or on the alleged right of subrogation, contains no positive opinion of the committee as to the proper distribution of the money, and no findings of fact or law; but, after reciting some circumstances and general considerations in favor of a judicial inquiry, concludes by a recommendation that an act be passed submitting th whole matter to the Court of Claims, with authority to distribute the money "according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations."

This, at first sight, seems reasonable, and is, apparently, a fair solution of the question. It also commends itself by the fact that it delivers Congress from a troublesome responsibility, where it is impossible to please all parties. But it is clear, as will appear in the argument, that the insurance companies could not establish any claim, in any court of law or equity, to indemnity as against the United States, supposing that it consented to be sued, by force of any existing law or precedent, without the aid of this act. But the act proposed contains no directions to the court how to proceed in the distribution, and the court must, if it consents to take jurisdiction, therefore, act solely from a regard to its own ideas of justice and equity.

Now, is it to be argued that a court, in such a predicament, tied, as all courts are, by their practice and habits of thought, to precedent and authority, is more likely to deal with this case wisely and fairly, without instructions from this Congress, than it would under an act with a provision deciding how the money shall be distributed and leaving the proof of ownership and other matters of evidence involved in the work of distribution to the rules and methods adopted in such investigation?

But suppose the court should find that, according to the authorities, our Government could not be considered as an agent or trustee, and that the right of subrogation did not apply, and that there was no rule of law or equity applicable to the case, what would it then do? Would it attempt to deal with this fund upon its own vague notions of justice and equity or would it decide that upon no principle of law or equity known to the court is either party entitled to it, and so report the case back to Congress for its further action?

If the case is to stand upon general considerations of justice and equity, in the adjustment of conflicting claims, I prefer the judgment of this House to the judgment of any court, which, in the given case, is authorized to proceed uncontrolled by precedent or authority, unsupported by any principle which has been judicially recognized and defined, and unaided by any direction of Congress The only issue distinctly raised between the majority and minority of the committee is in respect to the expediency of committing the whole subject to a court, with or without instructions. The majority say that it is the duty of Congress to decide how this fund should be distributed among the different claimants, leaving the proof of the claims to be established before a judicial tribunal by the methods usually adopted in such proceedings.

To commit this case to the court, with authority to decide it according to its notions of equity and justice, is to commit it to their discretion; and it is difficult to see how Congress can do this without virtually abdicating the power and authority which it is its duty to exercise.

In De Bode's case, (8 Q. B. 217,) where a certain sum was paid by the French Government, and the claims of individual citizens were released by Great Britain, the plaintiff filed his petition of right against the Queen, and alleged that the sum paid was increased by the amount of his claim; but the court held that "there was no rule or principle by which his claim could be maintained; that the money in question was in the hands of the Crown, to be disposed of as her legal advisers might recommend; that no person had a legal right to any part of it." The counsel for the plaintiff, when pressed by the argument that there were no rules by which the court could make distribution, replied that it was sufficient to show that his client's claim was founded in general justice. To which Maule, J., replied, "Neither the Queen's Bench nor any other court administers justice in general."

The doctrine that a question of distribution in a case of this kind is a proper subject for the exercise of that discretion which resides in the sovereign authority of the nation, and not for judicial inquiry, has been held by the courts themselves.

In Rustomgee's case, decided by the Queen's Bench, in England, in 1875, where an attempt was made to direct by the court the disposition of money received by the Queen, under a treaty with China, the court said, "The distribution of this money must be left to her majesty's discretion." And in the same case Mr. Justice Cockburn said:

> I do not think that it can be possibly said, that where the Queen has, as a high act of state, made a treaty and received money in consequence of an act of state, the mode of distribution is in any way enforceable by a court of law. * * * I think there is a moral claim that it be given to the right person, which must be investigated in the manner which her majesty is pleased to direct.

And in the review of this case by the court of appeals, Lord Coleridge affirmed the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, and said "that in all that relates to the making and performance of a treaty with another sovereign, it is the duty of the Crown to do justice to her subjects."

It is argued in behalf of the insurance companies, in the minority report, that the proposition to refer this question of distribution to a court is in accordance with the practice in like cases, and the statutes of the United States are cited in the cases of the treaties with Great Britain in 1826, with Denmark in 1830, with France in 1831, with the two Sicilies in 1832, with Spain in 1834, with Peru in 1841, with Brazil in 1849, and with China in 1858, in support of this statement. Now, it may be said in respect of these treaties, not only that they were cases of settlement of private claims, as distinct from national, and negotiated as such by our Government, but that in not one of them were the commissioners clothed with any powers beyond such as are usually vested in a board of commissioners whose function is purely executive and ministerial, to examine the formal proofs and audit the accounts, and perform the duty which is usually discharged by an auditor or master in chancery.

No person can examine these statutes without perceiving that no judicial inquiry, in the sense of adjudicating any difficult or important question of law or equity, was contemplated. This appears from the fact that there was no provision for an appeal, and that in nearly all these cases the whole work of distribution was to be performed by the commissioners in one year from the date of their commission. The only case of the appointment of commissioners under a treaty, to receive and examine claims, where the language used implies an intent to confer judicial function, as distinct from a ministerial one, is in the appointment of commissioners in relation to the Geneva award, under the act of 1874. In this act the board is called a court, and their decisions are termed judgments; but even in this act, the judicial power is so limited, that no right of appeal is provided, and the powers of the court, so constituted, are limited and defined by Congress precisely as the majority of the committee propose to do in their bill, which revives this court for the purpose of distributing the remainder of the fund.

The argument, therefore, that Congress has heretofore conferred unlimited judicial power on a court, as proposed by the minority of the committee, is unsupported by the facts, and it is safe to challenge the production of a single case which, upon examination, can be fairly cited as an authority for the course recommended by the minority of the committee.

This case, then, calls clearly for the exercise of the legislative powers of the Government. There are no rules recognized by the courts under which the distribution could be made, and the injustice of submitting the rights of the claimants in this case to a board of commissioners, whose duties are mainly that of auditing accounts, is so manifest that the minority of the committee propose to give the litigants the right of appeal to the Supreme Court, which would postpone the ultimate decision of the case for an indefinite period, and, by unreasonable delay and expense, in many instances make the claim practically worthless. In other words, to avoid the injustice of compelling claimants to accept as final the decision of a court of limited jurisdiction upon questions of the adjustment of conflicting equities, growing out of complex relations and demanding for their satisfactory solution the exercise of the highest discretion, an appeal is given to the Supreme Court, which would be attended with such delay and expense as to afford but little satisfaction to the claimant.

Assuming, then, that it is the duty of Congress to decide to whom this fund will be paid, and that the proper discharge of this duty depends on considerations which Congress alone is competent to decide, I come now to the question, how shall this fund be distributed? And in dealing with it I submit that Congress is perfectly free to act as may seem to it, in its sovereign discretion, to be right under the circumstances, unrestrained by any rule or precedent, and unembarrassed by liabilities or complications of any sort growing out of its relations to any party to the case.

This has been denied by the insurance companies, who have endeavored to make it appear by an ingenious array of circumstances that the Government in the proceedings at Geneva was acting for them and was so committed to their fortunes and their interests that it could not honorably question their right to the fund. This view is so plausible, and is at first sight apparently so supported by facts, that some of the ablest men who have taken part in the discussion of this case have adopted it. But it has not stood the test of careful criticism, and is now virtually abandoned by some of the companies themselves. It is clear from a study and comparison of the facts and of the record that our Government in the proceedings at Geneva did not undertake to act for any individual claimant or any class of claimants. It sought to obtain redress for national injuries and to represent the rights or interests of individuals only so far as they were a part of the nation.

The absurdity of the pretense that our Government was virtually acting at Geneva as the agent of the insurance companies is clearly brought out when it is remembered that the relations of the Government to all the claimants were such that it could only undertake to act in good faith as a common guardian, and not as agent or trustee of one class, in derogation of the rights of others whose interests were adverse. And because of the complications which might ensue in case the Government could be considered the agent or trustee of any class of claimants, it was careful to issue the circular of September, 1871, in which it is stated "that the State Department could not undertake to direct what claims may be preferred, nor what proof may be necessary, nor the effect of insurance upon the question of compensation. It will present to the tribunal at Geneva all claims growing out of the Alabama claims, so called, which may be presented to the Department." Here is simply an offer to present, with no words which can be fairly construed into an undertaking to collect and enforce as agent for the claimants.

The same caution to avoid any liability as agent or trustee for any class of claimants is more clearly seen in the letter of Secretary Fish of 8th December, 1871, to the United States consul. The Secretary says:

> In the treatment of this entire case you will be careful not to commit the Government of what may be awarded. * * * The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount received will be made by this Government, without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such commitment will be avoided in the argument of counsel.

Is not this letter a full and decisive answer to any argument that may be made, based on any implied agency which seems to be found in any circumstances or correspondence between the Government and any claimants?

I submit, therefore, that there is nothing in the history or record of this case, nor in the conduct of the Government, that invests it with the character of agent or trustee of any claimant, or that fairly commits the Government to the validity of any of the claims presented.

I pass on now to another branch of this case. Is there anything in the history of the proceedings at Geneva that shows that the arbitrators allowed or disallowed any claim or any class of private claims which had been presented them by our Government, or were their judgments limited to an estimate of the value of the property destroyed by the insurgent cruisers, without regard to the validity of the different claims? Upon this point there can be no doubt. The award is for a sum in gross, in full satisfaction of all the claims referred to the tribunal. The award was manifestly based on an estimate of the value of the property destroyed for which Great Britain was responsible. The arbitrators only had authority to award a sum in gross. In the event that they declined to exercise that authority, it was provided in the treaty of Washington that a board of commissioners shall be appointed to determine what claims were valid. In framing the treaty of Washington the high commissioners on the part of Great Britain at first objected to the clause giving authority to the tribunal at Geneva to award a sum in gross, and it was only at the urgent request of the commissioners on the part of the United States that they consented that the award might be so made as to leave the question of distribution open among the different claimants, to be decided by the United States.

But it may be said that while the tribunal at Geneva did not, in computing the amount of the award, pass upon the validity of each claim in detail, but only consulted the schedules of claims as convenient evidence for the purpose of approximating the actual value of the property destroyed, yet its action in disallowing the claim for the cost of the enhanced rates of premium and in holding that Great Britain was not responsible for the acts of the rebel cruisers, which are now called the exculpated cruisers, virtually decided that the money awarded justly belonged to the vessel-owners and to the insurance companies who had indemnified the owners whose vessels had been destroyed by the exculpated cruisers, so called.

It is true the tribunal at Geneva decided that, according to the principles of international law applicable to such cases, no compensation in damages could be awarded by them in respect to certain classes of claims submitted to them by this Government. It is also true that the claim for damages by reason of increased cost of insurance for war risks was included in this decision.

It is also true that, by reason of this decision, our Government withdrew this subject from the tribunal. But this fact is not decisive of the question now before us, namely, shall the war-premium payers have a part of this fund? and for this reason:

At the hearing at Geneva the United States submitted claims for compensation against Great Britain under the five following heads, namely:

First. Claims for losses caused by destruction of vessels and cargoes by insurgent cruisers.

Second. For national expenditures incurred in pursuit of cruisers.

Third. For losses incurred in transfer of our merchant vessels to the British flag.

Fourth. For losses incurred by payment of war premiums.

Fifth. For costs incurred by the prolongation of the war.

Now, it will be perceived from this statement that the United States preferred a claim at Geneva for losses caused by increased rates of insurance as a distinct and substantive ground of damage in addition to the claim for losses caused by the destruction of vessels and their cargoes. This claim was withdrawn by our Government after the tribunal had declared that it was not considered by them in that relation as a proper subject for compensation in damages. I repeat that our Government was attempting to recover compensation for enhanced cost of insurance in addition to what it might receive for destruction of vessels and property. As a distinct and independent element of damage, after the declaration of the tribunal at Geneva, it was withdrawn; but such action is not decisive of the right of the war-premium payers to a part of this fund, which was paid and received as indemnity for the losses suffered by the destruction of vessels and cargoes by rebel cruisers, when the question is upon the adjustment of the equities.

Here and now the question arises in an entirely new relation. The war-premium payer asks that he may have a part of the money which was paid by Great Britain for the destruction of vessels and cargoes for which she was held responsible. The award was made to cover the entire loss of property destroyed by the inculpated rebel cruisers, without regard to its ultimate distribution. But when the United States, in the discharge of its duty, attempted to distribute it among those of its citizens who, by reason of their relations to the subject-matter, had especial claim to consideration, it found itself confronted with certain equities and complications which have kept the question open till this time. It found no difficulty in allowing and paying the claims of the vessel owners, and of the insurance companies, to the extent of their respective losses, deducting from the value of the property destroyed the amount of the indemnity received by them from other sources. This payment took about half of the award, and when it came to the distribution of the remaining half, the war-premium men, and the losers by the exculpated cruisers, came in and urged their claims in opposition to those of the insurance companies. They said, you have not paid the vessel owner in full because your principle is indemnity for actual loss, and, under the peculiar circumstances, we have stronger claims on your bounty than those insurance companies who have actually realized a profit from their business of war risks. It is true that the tribunal allowed nothing for costs incurred by payment of extra premiums, and that the claims of those who suffered losses by the exculpated cruisers were disallowed; but such decisions are not conclusive on the question of distribution, which was never considered by the Geneva tribunal.

This money was received by the United States in its sovereign capacity as a nation—not as the agent or trustee of any person or corporation—with full liberty, therefore, to distribute it according to its own ideas of justice and equity. But it is bound by the highest considerations of justice and good faith to distribute it among those who suffered by the conduct of the rebel cruisers in a sense distinct from those who lost in common with the whole community.

Shall the owners of this property have it unconditionally? Or must they deduct what they have received from insurance companies and recover only the balance? Can the owner object that the Government in the proceedings at Geneva presented his claim in the schedule for the full value of the property, and therefore is precluded from denying his right of recovery without deduction? This cannot be seriously maintained; and yet if the doctrine of the insurance companies be sound—that our Government at Geneva was virtually the agent of the claimants—it is difficult to see why our Government is not estopped from calling in question the amount due the vessel owner.

Again, if the fact of insurance is to be considered in ascertaining the amount due the vessel owner, and if the doctrine of subrogation is to be applied, why should the owner of an insured vessel which has been destroyed receive anything when, by the insurance law, the valuation in the policy is decisive, and whatever is recovered belongs to the company which has paid for a total loss? No one can deny that our Government did its full duty in relation to the owners of property destroyed by the rebel cruisers when it paid them from the award the amount of their claims, less insurance-money received. But because of these deductions, which are conceded to have been right and equitable, only about half of the money received from Great Britain has been distributed.

Three parties now insist upon a right to a share of the money: the war-premium payers, and the owners of the vessels that were destroyed by the exculpated rebel cruisers—on the ground that they were the actual sufferers by the acts of the rebel cruisers, and that it is the moral duty of the Government to so distribute this money as to indemnify the actual sufferers—and, lastly, the insurance companies, who make no claim to especial consideration on the ground of loss or hardship, but who demand it as their property. The insurance companies base their claim on two grounds:

First. That this Government, in collecting the money from Great Britain, acted as their agent, and therefore is precluded from denying their title.

Second. That, by virtue of their relation as insurers to the owners of the property destroyed, for which the Geneva award was indemnity, they succeeded to the rights of these owners, and, in professional phrase, should be subrogated to them, having to the extent of their undertaking indemnified the owners for losses which otherwise the Government would have paid. This two-fold title to the fund has been urged by the insurance companies with a confidence and assurance which would brook no denial, and in the history of the discussion in Congress it has been advocated by some of our most able and distinguished men. But it has not stood the test of close scrutiny and criticism. It has been found on careful investigation that it is unsupported by fact or law. An examination of the record shows that our Government, in the proceedings at Geneva, while presenting the different claims was careful not to assume any such character as that of an agent for the respective parties, and, to avoid any such construction, gave explicit direction to its counsel not to commit itself in any way that could possibly interfere with the exercise of the utmost latitude of discretion in respect to the distribution of the fund in case the arbitrators should award a sum in gross. It is not true, therefore, as a matter of fact, that our Government undertook to act as agent for the different claimants in any such sense as would impose on it the duties and liabilities which arise between principal and agent.

But not only is it true that there was no agency in fact, but, as the law is now settled and adjudged by the highest authority, no such relation as that of agent or trustee subsists between the Government and its citizens or subjects in the negotiation of a treaty, where the rights of individuals are involved as claimants. This point was carefully considered in 1875, in England, by the court of appeals, in the Rustomgee case, before cited for another purpose, and it is now the established law. In the words of Lord Coleridge, now chief-justice of England, "that in all that relates to the making and performance of a treaty with another sovereign, the Crown cannot be a trustee or an agent for any subject whatever. It cannot be trammeled by trusts or agencies of individual citizens." In this same case, Lord Cockburn said that "the notion that the Queen becomes an agent of her subjects seems to me too wild a notion to require a single word of observation." * * * "In like manner, to say that the sovereign becomes trustee for subjects seems equally untenable."

This doctrine enters as much into our system as it does into the principles of the British Constitution. (See remarks of Mr. Justice Strong in Savings Bank vs. United States, 19 Wall., 227.)

So that this pretension that the relation of an agent or trustee existed between this Government and the insurance companies is not only destitute of all foundation of fact, but it is inconsistent with that authority and responsibility which reside in the supreme power of the Government when negotiating a treaty with foreign powers in behalf of its citizens. It is true that the relation which subsists between the sovereign authority of a nation and its citizens is, in some respects, like that which exists between a trustee and the party interested beneficially in the trust, so that the service which is due from the Government to the citizen may resemble that performed by a trustee, or, in some respects, that of an agent.

But it is misconception of the true relation that exists between the sovereign authority of a nation and its citizens to construe what may be due in behalf of the citizen by the government, in discharge of its duty of guardianship and protection, as implying any such relation or liability as exists between principal and agent, or of trustee and cestui que trust.

I dismiss, then, the argument in favor of the insurance companies based on any relation, express or implied, by which this Government was virtually committed to their interests and could not honorably deny their claims, as unsound and indefensible.

I come now to the argument in behalf of the insurance companies founded on the right of subrogation; and that needs but a short answer. The right of subrogation, as defined by high authority, "rests upon the well-known principle of law that where one person has agreed to indemnify another, he will, on making good the indemnity, be entitled to succeed to all the ways and means of which the person indemnified might have protected himself against or reimbursed himself for the loss." There must be a right of redress or reimbursement in the party insured to which the insurance company may succeed. And the misfortune of the insurance company in this case is that the ship-owner had no claim to redress or compensation in damage upon anybody. His ship had been destroyed by an act of war. The act of destruction was a lawful act, and though the neglect to use due diligence on the part of Great Britain, by which rebel cruisers made use of her ports, made such destruction possible, no right of action existed against Great Britain or the insurgent States, or even against the actors themselves in the work of destruction, in favor of the party injured.

It is well settled as a principle of law that no action will lie for an injury sustained by neglect of public duty on the part of a government, where no positive act of wrong has been committed. The insurance companies cannot therefore bring themselves within the doctrine of subrogation as defined by the authorities.

If this view be correct, the owners of the property destroyed had no legal claim for compensation on anybody. If the owner of the vessel destroyed had no legal right to any part of this award, clearly the insurance company standing on the right of subrogation is in no better predicament. But it may be said that the right of the owners of the vessel destroyed has been acknowledged by the act of 1874, and by the proceedings under which a portion of this award has been distributed, and that therefore Congress is now concluded from denying the rights to which the insurance companies claim to be subrogated.

The act in question was no such acknowledgment. It recognized the legal right of no claimant to any part of the fund. It is an attempt to indemnify those who actually suffered by the acts of the insurgent cruisers, for which Great Britain was held responsible to this nation. The principle of that act is indemnity for actual losses, not because there is any obligation, legal or equitable, which could be enforced against the Government in any court, if the Government could be sued, but because the Government, in its sovereign political capacity, not as agent or trustee, but as the guardian of all its citizens, of its own motion, recognized the considerations of natural justice in dealing with those of its citizens who met with special losses by the acts of the rebel cruisers. And, in the continuance of the policy established by this act, it is now our duty to distribute what may remain of this award among those who may be regarded as entitled to special consideration by reason of their losses. Those whose vessels were destroyed by the cruisers, for which Great Britain was held responsible, had the first equity, and their claims have been paid, and also those of the insurance companies, to the extent of their net losses.

I have shown that the claim of the insurance companies that the Government was a trustee for them in this business could not be maintained, and that the right of subrogation, in their favor, was also untenable. Is there anything in this case analogous to the right of subrogation which should give them a valid claim on this fund? The companies insist that as they indemnified the owner of the vessel, who was insured, and thereby released the Government from its duty to pay him to the extent of the insurance, that they should succeed to his right to indemnity, and receive from the Government what otherwise the owner of the vessel would have received; that this money, which would otherwise have gone to the vessel owner, is to be considered in the nature of salvage which should now come to them. But it is submitted that the principles which underlie the doctrine of salvage or subrogation should not apply in this case—

First, because in ordinary marine insurance the chance for salvage is so considerable that it enters into the premium rates, which are, to a certain extent, reduced in expectation of salvage; but in war risks, no salvage is anticipated, and the rates are correspondingly increased and adjusted to the theory of a total loss.

In the pamphlet recently published by the Atlantic Insurance Company, entitled "Some Brief Considerations," it is said, "capture by a rebel cruiser meant total destruction: hence the underwriter was forced to advance the premium upon the risk liable to capture." To allow, then, the claim of underwriters, unconditionally, in this case, would be unjust, as it would be, in effect, allowing the claim for salvage, when the war premiums were adjusted at increased rates, which were only justifiable on the ground that all losses would be total losses, and no salvage would be possible.

Second. It is objected that the doctrine of subrogation, though a well-defined doctrine, is founded on equitable considerations, and if applied in this case, would confer an undue and unjust advantage on the insurance companies, because, as before stated, the war premiums were adjusted at high rates with no allowance for salvage, and because the war-premium businsss, as conducted by the insurance companies, in the great majority of cases, has been attended with the expected profit, which was very remunerative.

To grant indemnity to the companies to the extent of their demands would be to give them salvage where war premiums were charged and received as adequate compensation for the risks assumed, and to add to the already large profits derived from this branch of their business the enormous sum of more than five millions of money, a result too unjust and too inconsistent with any fair view of indemnity to be possibly sanctioned or tolerated by any tribunal that was free to do justice, unembarrassed by rule or precedent.

This answer to the unconditional demand of the underwriters to stand in the place of the vessel-owners is not the invention of claimants whose interests are adverse to those of the insurance companies, and who are endeavoring to defeat their claims by arguments which, though specious, are unsound. The glaring injustice of allowing the underwriter to stand, unconditionally, in the place of the vessel-owner insured, was so apparent that Sir Roundell Palmer, who is not only by common consent at the head of the English bar in learning, intelligence, and integrity, but a statesman eminently just, high-minded, and upright, declared in the hearing at Geneva, in his argument as counsel for Great Britain, that, "with respect to the insurance companies, it must be remembered that, as against the losses which they paid, they received the benefit of the enormous war premiums which ruled at that time, and that those were the risks against which they indemnified themselves (and it is not to be doubted so as to make their business profitable upon the whole) by those extraordinary premiums. Would it be equitable now to reimburse them, not only the amount of their losses, but interest thereon, without taking into account any part of the profits which they so received?" The same thought was manifestly in the minds of the commissioners on the part of the United States, who negotiated the treaty of Washington, when they urged the English commissioners to consent to the provision which authorized the tribunal at Geneva to award a sum in gross, leaving the entire subject of distribution to the discretion of this Government. The same thought was also in the mind of the Secretary of State when he wrote to our counsel at Geneva that our Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. "If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government, without committal as to the mode of distribution."

Is it not clear from the evidence that the injustice of allowing the claims of insurance companies full indemnity for losses paid by them was perceived and admitted by our Government in the commencement of the proceedings at Geneva, and that our Government purposely avoided anything which would commit it to the interests of any class of claimants, and succeeded in obtaining an award which left the question of distribution open to the discretion of the Government, to be dealt with as it thought proper, acting under a high sense of its responsibility, and with a desire to do justice to all parties? And yet parties representing the insurance companies persist in the declaration that the Government, by its conduct in the preparation of the case, and in the proceedings at Geneva, was so identified with the interests of the insurance companies that it was no more competent for it to question their rights than it would be for an agent who had collected money for his principal to pocket the money, and challenge his master to prove his title. This case illustrates the importance of using terms with precision, and of the grave errors which may arise from the confounding one relation with another to which it bears some resemblance.

It is interesting to observe that while the insurance companies in the beginning made no appeal to the generosity and favor of Congress, but demanded a share of the fund as their undoubted right, and while some persons most vehemently still attempt to enforce that view—to deny which, they insist, would be an act of gross and flagrant injustice—in a very recent pamphlet, before mentioned, published by the Atlantic Mutual, entitled "Some brief observations," no allusion is made to the obligations of this Government, as their agent and trustee to pay them, nor is any stress laid upon the right of subrogation; but the authors content themselves with a criticism on the conduct of the war-premium payers, and assert that they are entitled to special consideration, "because in engaging in the business of war-risks they acted solely from a sense of national duty and honor."

The persistency and pertinacity with which the insurance companies have attempted to make the country and Congress believe that the Government was so committed to their interests that it could not honorably deal with the question of distribution as an open question is a confession of the weakness of their case, when compared with that of others whose claims were also presented by the State Department at Geneva but who are content to stand upon their equitable claims to a favorable consideration when the Government shall distribute this fund according to the principles which should control the exercise of that discretion which belongs to the sovereign authority of the nation in its legislative capacity, and which is alone competent to deal with the complications in this case.

Rejecting, as untenable, any title which the insurance companies assert to this money by virtue of any relation which subsisted between them and the Government, or between them and the owners of the property destroyed, it is, I submit, a full answer to their claim to indemnity, that, upon a fair computation of their gains and losses in the business of war insurance, they met with no loss for which they have not been reimbursed, under the act of 1874; that they have now, therefore, no claims to consideration as actual losers by the acts of the insurgent cruisers which the Government is bound to respect.

I come now to the war-premium men. Have they any right or equities, in a moral or political sense, which give them any claim on a part of this fund, which should be respected and allowed? The war-premium men make no claim on the Government like that set up by the insurance companies, though the Government represented their interests at Geneva. They have never pretended, with the hope of gaining any unfair advantage, that the Government was their agent or trustee at Geneva, and that, if their interests were sacrificed by that tribunal to secure some national benefit, the Government is legally bound to make their losses good. They are willing to rest their case upon the fact that they were actually losers by the acts of the rebel cruisers, and that it was the war premiums paid by them that furnished the means with which the insurance companies indemnified the owners of vessels that the cruisers captured and destroyed. They say with truth that the money now in the Treasury to a large extent can be fairly traced to the war premiums which they paid and which were forced from them by the presence of the rebel cruisers on the high seas, and that such forced contributions were actual losses, for which they have received no compensation in any form.

The war premium, which was a severe tax, was so much added to the cost of their adventures, which they could not charge to their customers, and in that way get it back, because the prices of merchandise and freight were controlled by foreigners who were not subject to this expense, and who could therefore compel the American merchants to compete at disadvantage or retire from business. Such a retirement was impossible, as it involved an election between doing business at disadvantage or allowing the ships to rot at the wharves. It was therefore in no fair sense a voluntary payment, but a contribution forced from the merchants by the dangers arising from the rebel cruisers, which our Government, laboring under the heavy burden of maintaining large armies in the field to suppress the rebellion, was powerless to prevent.

It is therefore clear that after the owners of the vessels whose property was destroyed are indemnified to the extent of their losses, those who suffered losses by the forced payment of war premiums and who indirectly contributed to the formation of the indemnity fund in the Treasury should be allowed a distributive share of what may remain.

The claims of those who suffered losses by the acts of the exculpated cruisers, so called, that is by the acts of the cruisers for which Great Britain was not held responsible, may, it seems to me, be well maintained on grounds peculiar to this class of claims. But this class of claimants is well represented on this floor by other members, who will present their case forcibly and effectively, and I shall content myself with the statement that they stand upon considerations which strongly appeal to the sense of justice and equity of this House and to those reasons of public policy which make it the duty of the State, in cases of peculiar loss and hardship, to come to the aid and relief of the citizen.

Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored to set forth the reasons which, in my judgment, should lead the House to deny the claims of the insurance companies, and to favor those of the sufferers by the acts of the exculpated cruisers, and those who have lost by the forced payments of war premiums. I hope that the action of this House will justify the view which I have endeavored to express, and that before it adjourns this Congress shall make a final dividend of the money derived from the Geneva award, which has been too long retained for the credit and good name of our Government.

When the civil war was concluded and the people had time to breathe, their first thought was satisfaction from Great Britain for its cruel and unfriendly conduct in the time of our extreme peril, when the future was almost without hope and the life of the Union seemed suspended by a thread. A spirit of indignation pervaded all classes of our loyal citizens, so intense that any slight act of imprudence on the part of the Government would have provoked another war with all its evils. But fortunately for us and for Great Britain, the destinies of the two nations under Providence were committed to the keeping of statesmen who were equal to the exigency, and the result was the treaty of Washington, the great diplomatic triumph of this age. It is a brilliant illustration of the possibilities of statesmanship which can evolve from the differences of nations that threaten to eventuate in the unspeakable calamities of war a solid and genuine peace, the essential condition of true national grandeur and prosperity. It will take its place hereafter among the notable historic events which mark the progress of nations in the onward march of civilization. Among the valuable results of that treaty was the judgment of the tribunal at Geneva, which established for our guide in the future important rules of conduct and liability between neutrals and belligerents, and awarded a gross sum to this country as compensation for certain losses for which Great Britain was adjudged responsible.

This award has been paid, and upon us has devolved the duty of its distribution among those of our citizens who, in the judgment of the nation, as represented by its supreme legislative authority, have a moral claim upon its favor and consideration. No party has any title to it, in law or equity. The Government alone, in the exercise of its own discretion, and according to its own sense of duty and honor, must be its own judge of what is right and proper, and is responsible to no tribunal, foreign or domestic, for the propriety of its action. But every right-minded member of this Congress, because of this freedom from responsibility, will be only the more careful to so act as to deserve the commendation of mankind when this transaction has passed into history and is seen in that dry light which is free from passion and prejudice.

It has been said that we can do what we please with this money, give it away, or appropriate it to the payment of the ordinary current expenses of administration, and nobody will have a right to complain. If it be meant by this remark that no government or foreign power could, with propriety, criticise the action of this Government in dealing with a purely domestic question that exclusively concerns its own citizens, I agree. If it be meant that this Government can safely afford to treat disdainfully the enlightened opinion of the civilized world, I dissent. No nation, however strong in its resources, however prosperous, can dismiss with contempt, as an impertinence, that impartial public opinion which, when matured, is the best product of the best minds. Let us be careful lest, in the plenitude of power, we contract something of the insolence of power. Let us deal with this question with a due sense of our responsibility to the demands of honor and good faith, anxious only, in the exercise of that latitude of discretion which is the prerogative of the supreme legislative authority, but which, for wise reasons, is denied a judicial tribunal, to distribute, without unnecessary delay, that which is not morally ours among those of our citizens who, by reason of their losses and their relations to this fund, have special claims for indemnity which we are bound in honor to respect.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the House in discussing this bill. I am opposed to the bill in its present shape. I am sure careful examination into the facts connected with the Geneva award must convince all that Congress cannot honorably reverse the decision made by the tribunal at Geneva.

The business before them was of the highest importance and received most careful consideration. It has been stated "that the insurance companies charged so immense a premium that when they got through they had actually recouped their loss and paid themselves 30 or 40 per cent. premium on their business." I do not so understand it, and it is easier making the assertion than it is to prove the fact.

It has also been stated that losses paid by citizens engaged in the business of protecting other citizens from loss by insuring them against the risks of war are not to be reimbursed, for the reason that they charged and received a premium for the insurance; and, further, for the reason that they, or some of them, may have received, in the aggregate, a larger amount of premium on all the risks insured than the aggregate amount paid for those that were lost; and, therefore, if such was the case, they have really sustained no loss, but, on the contrary, have made a profit by their business; in substance the same as stated above, and, finally, that although ordinarily the insurers on the payment of a loss become subrogated to all the rights of the party insured, yet this rule may not possibly hold good when it is a question of national wrong committed upon the high seas, which can only be settled between two nations, and which the government of the individuals suffering by it is not bound to pursue to a settlement for the benefit of a few of its citizens beyond the limit which its own discretion and its view of the public interests may dictate and, therefore, that as the right of subrogation under these circumstances has only such practical vitality as may be given to it by the action of the government, it may acquire thereby some color of right to determine what disposition shall be made of the indemnification recovered through its intervention. What are the facts in regard to these claims? To me they are simple and very plain, and I cannot see how this honorable body can honestly go behind the verdict rendered by the tribunal of arbitration.

After the treaty of Washington, in 1871, it became necessary for our Government to prepare its case for submission to the tribunal of arbitration. It advertised for claimants to send in their claims, and as insurers were known to be large claimants and were in possession of the proofs, it addressed a circular to all insurance companies requesting them to forward their claims. This they did, transmitting them with all the evidence and the assignments made to them by the parties to whom they had paid the losses. These claims, together with the claims of parties who had stood their own insurers, (commonly called uninsured,) were collated by the State Department and printed in a volume, in which the name of each claimant, insurance company, and uninsured party appeared, with full particulars of the property destroyed, when, where, and by what cruiser. It also printed in the same volume a claim on behalf of the Government itself, for expenses of the "prolongation of the war," &c., and also some few claims of parties for "premiums" paid for insuring against "war risks."

When the tribunal met, the British Government refused to go on with the arbitration unless all claims for indirect or consequential losses were withdrawn. For a time it looked as if the arbitration would be a failure.

Thereupon the tribunal considered the subject, and on the 19th of June, 1872, announced:

> That after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these (indirect) claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these (indirect) claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations; and should, upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there were no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon.

Thereupon the counsel of the United States at Geneva advised their Government "that this declaration of the tribunal should be submitted to, and that the United States, with a view of maintaining the due course of the arbitration on the other claims without adjournment, should announce to the tribunal that the said (indirect) claims covered by its opinion will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration by the tribunal in making its award."

In reply to this, our Secretary of State communicated the determination of the President, as follows:

> I have laid your telegrams before the President, who directs me to say that he accepts the declaration of the tribunal as its judgment upon a question of public law which he had felt that the interests of both Governments required should be decided, and for the determination of which he had felt it important to present the claims referred to for the purpose of taking the opinion of the tribunal.
> This is the attainment of an end which this Government had in view in the putting forth of those claims. We had no desire for a pecuniary award, but desired an expression by the tribunal as to the liability of a neutral for claims of that character. The President, therefore, further accepts the opinion and advice of the counsel as set forth above, and authorizes the announcement to the tribunal that he accepts their declaration as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law as to which he had felt it his duty to seek the expression of their opinion; and that, in accordance with such opinion and judgment, from henceforth he regards the claims set forth in the case presented on the part of the United States for loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag, the enhanced payment of insurance, and the prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion, as adjudicated and disposed of; and that, consequently, they will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, but are henceforth excluded from its consideration by the tribunal in making its award.

This was announced to the tribunal; all claims for "war premiums" were withdrawn, and the arbitration was saved.

There then remained before the tribunal only the following claims:

1. The claims of insurers.
2. The claims of parties uninsured.
3. The claims of masters and sailors for personal effects and wages.

The above is quoted from Caleb Cushing's book, "The Treaty of Washington," pages 70, 72, 73, and the "decision and award," in the appendix to the same.

Now, as these losses had been occasioned by several different cruisers, the tribunal took up the case of each one separately, considered it, and made its decision as to whether Great Britain was liable for the loss of vessels and cargoes it had destroyed. The decision and award was that Great Britain was liable for the losses occasioned by seven named cruisers, and was not liable for the losses occasioned by eleven named cruisers.

The next step of the tribunal was to refer the list of claims presented by the United States in behalf of insurance companies and uninsured parties and masters and sailors to experts, to estimate and ascertain as accurately as possible the total amount of claims for such losses occasioned by the seven cruisers for which Great Britain was held liable, and having received their report and decided that it was just to allow interest, they awarded, on the 17th September, 1872, the sum of $15,500,000 in satisfaction of all claims for these losses, and Great Britain paid it.

This is a brief and, I believe, true history of the award.

Our Government has distributed only a portion of it thus far to uninsured parties and masters and sailors. The balance of the award, received in payment of the claims of insurers, has not yet been paid. Why? Speculators sought out parties who had paid premiums for war risks, and made contracts with them to undertake their collection from the Geneva award for 50 per cent. or some other share of the amount they might collect. These speculators, employing agents and attorneys, have thus far succeeded in defeating payment of the claims of insurers, and in consequence another set of claimants have been encouraged to try their hand at it.

It is generally understood that if the insurers had consented to compromise with the "war-premium" claimants a bill could have been passed at the last session to distribute the balance of the award between both, pro rata. The insurers declined.

Now, as to this bill under consideration, it will be seen by section 5 that it is prepared in the interest of a new set of claimants, for losses by "exculpated" cruisers, i. e., cruisers for which Great Britain was declared not liable and for which no part of the award was made. By section 8 these new claimants are to be paid first, and then if there is anything left the "war-premium" claimants are to have it. The insurers are ignored entirely.

A large portion of the award was paid for losses sustained by insurance companies in the city of New York. With one exception they were all "mutual" companies, that is to say, the persons who insured with them paid the premiums charged, and if at the end of each year the premiums paid exceeded the losses, the excess was returned to them pro rata.

The Legislature of New York some years ago passed an act authorizing these mutual companies to distribute among the parties who paid the premiums any moneys that should be recovered from the Geneva award. Now, if the insurance companies recover their share of the award the parties who paid them the premium will get it.

All fair-minded persons concede that the underwriters ought to have the money that was collected in their name and on their behalf from Great Britain. Hon. Caleb Cushing, who acted as senior counsel of the United States at Geneva, wrote in October, 1872, as follows:

That the tribunal examined and scrutinized the schedules and estimates of individual losses presented by the United States, and on inspection thereof awarded a sum in gross which they conceived to be sufficient (and which I think is sufficient) to afford a just indemnity to the injured citizens of the United States. This gross sum will within a year be paid by Great Britain to the United States, with interest on any delay. It will be received and held by the United States as a trust fund to be distributed among parties interested conformably to the tenor and spirit of the award of the tribunal, and the Government will be bound to make such distribution promptly and justly by the moral force of its duty of good faith to England, and its obligations to fulfill the stipulations of the treaty of Washington. There is no contingency or uncertainty in all this. Parties in interest may, I do not hesitate to say, rest assured of the honor and good faith of the Government of the United States in this respect with just as much certitude as in the payment of the gold bonds of the Government.

Touching the relative positions, as claimants of the underwriters and war-premium parties, I quote the following statement of facts which have been brought to my notice:

The aggregate claims of the thirty-six companies on file in the Department of State (chiefly mutual) amount to something under $5,000,000, and * * * there are not less than thirty thousand respectable merchants interested in the honest distribution of this indemnity, represented by numerous companies, scattered over our vast continent—in New York, Boston, New Bedford, Brooklyn, Baltimore, and California. These claimants repose so much confidence in the justice of their claims, and the honesty and capacity of Congress, that they have formed no speculative rings and have steadily declined to sell out or compromise, whereas their opponents have aggregated by purchase at nominal rates large blocks of these war-premium and other illegal claims, purchased very low, because the holders have had no confidence in claims ignored by the tribunal.

It will be found that the enormous sum of $6,240,000 war-premium claims are held by only three hundred and forty-one individuals and firms, being an average of some eighteen thousand dollars each, while one-half of these claims, $3,690,000, falls into the hands of but five individuals and firms. There certainly appears to be no poverty here, the five claimants averaging each the modest sum of $738,000. The actual sufferers represented by the underwriters have, as is shown, an average claim of under $200 each.

We are informed the thirty-six insurance companies whose claims are on file are located (if still alive) in all the larger commercial cities. But it is worth noting that ten out of the twelve Boston companies interested and one-third of the New York companies in the list of claimants are bankrupt, with numerous poor creditors looking for relief to this fund so justly their due. As to the largest claimant among the underwriters—the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company—it appears that its claims, filed in the Department of State, aggregated $1,653,889, and were made (the company being purely mutual) in behalf of 9,276 dealers or members. These claims were filed during the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865—the heaviest loss having been incurred in 1863, namely: $818,296, or nearly one-half of the whole sum claimed.

In the time allotted me I cannot enter into the details of this subject, but I trust I have said sufficient to convince the conscientious members of this House that they cannot support the bill now under consideration without nullifying the action of the tribunal of arbitration.

It would, in my opinion, be very unjust for the Government to pay either class of claimants provided for in this bill and ignore the underwriters and insurers; therefore it ought not to pass.

Mr. HUTCHINS and Mr. CONVERSE next addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CONVERSE. I now yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BRIGGS.]

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate and this hour of the day I do not propose to enter into any discussion of the pending question. Being on the committee that investigated it, I did hope I should have time to submit such views as I entertain and such opinions as I have formed from that investigation, but I will not ask this House to yield a moment to me for that purpose, because it is of greater importance the public business should be proceeded with than that I should make a speech. Consequently, I yield the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I have thirty-five minutes which I did not take of the original hour, and I desire to yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. RAY,] and then to move the previous question, unless gentlemen object on the other side, or unless the gentleman from Georgia would like to speak.

Mr. BUCKNER. Let us adjourn.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. If I had time I would like to make some remarks in support of this minority report, because all the gentlemen who have spoken have spoken from the stand-point of interest, one advocating the class of claims belonging to his constituents and another advocating the class of claims belonging to his constituents.

I have no constituents interested in this case except as a general taxpayer to the Government. For them not one word has been uttered. If the gentleman thinks it so very important there should be a vote to-night I will forego any expression of any views I may have on the subject. Otherwise I would like to have time.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. REED. I think we had better come to a vote in regard to it. I am perfectly willing——

Mr. HOOKER. I suggest to the gentleman to let it go over until to-morrow.

A MEMBER. Does not the gentleman from Maine have an hour after the previous question has been ordered?

Mr. REED. I have. I now propose to give to the gentleman from New Hampshire fifteen minutes, and then I suggest the previous question be called; and after I have given ten minutes' time out of my hour, if I give twenty minutes to the gentleman from Georgia and reserve twenty minutes to myself, will that be satisfactory to him?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. That depends when I am to get it. I can speak more in twenty minutes to-morrow than in an hour this evening. I am willing to take twenty minutes to-morrow.

Mr. REED. Very well; we will do that. I yield now to the gentleman from New Hampshire for fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri insist on his motion to adjourn?

Mr. REED. That is the understanding.

Mr. MCLANE. When does the gentleman call for the previous question?

Mr. REED. It is understood distinctly the previous question is considered ordered at the end of the fifteen minutes which the gentleman from New Hampshire takes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri withdraw his motion to adjourn?

Mr. BUCKNER. I insist on the motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. MANNING. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. MCLANE. I ask the attention of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. MANNING. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. LADD, who is necessarily absent at this time, be allowed to print some remarks upon this subject in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. I ask consent that there be given general leave to print upon this subject.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that we now adjourn.

Mr. REED. Before that is done I desire that we shall reach a conclusion about which there can be no mistake in reference to the pending question. Is it understood that after the gentleman from New Hampshire has occupied the floor for fifteen minutes the previous question shall be considered as ordered?

Mr. BUCKNER. My motion was to adjourn; but the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] occupies such a relation to this case that he ought to be allowed such time as he may require.

Mr. RYAN. If the gentleman from Georgia is satisfied with the arrangement what objection can there be?

Mr. REED. There is certainly no intention to be discourteous to the gentleman from Georgia. On the contrary I desire to meet his views entirely.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I am satisfied that there is not; and the arrangement by which I may occupy the time to-morrow will be entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. REED. I understood from the gentleman from Georgia that he did not desire to be heard upon this question. Later, however, the gentleman informed me that inasmuch as no one had spoken directly upon his bill, he would like some time upon it; and I have endeavored to make such arrangement as would enable him to do so. I do not want any one to suppose that I would be in any way discourteous to a gentleman occupying the position he occupies, not only on the committee, but upon the floor of this House, and I am very sure the gentleman himself does not think any discourtesy was intended.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I am entirely satisfied of that, and should prefer greatly to occupy the time to-morrow. I will be able then to occupy the twenty minutes more satisfactorily to myself than an hour now.

Mr. REED. Then I ask unanimous consent that the understanding be now clearly reached that after the fifteen minutes allowed to the gentleman from New Hampshire the previous question be considered as ordered, and that the gentleman from Georgia shall be allowed to occupy his twenty minutes in the morning.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. And I join in the request.

Mr. BUCKNER. To-morrow is private bill day.

Mr. REED. I know that; but this will soon be disposed of. Is that the understanding?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. RANDALL. There is objection, unless it is also understood that the House after this bill is disposed of shall have the privilege of exercising its volition as to whether or not it will then go on with the Private Calendar.

Mr. REED. There is no objection to that.

Mr. RAY. I do not care to occupy the floor for the time allowed me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then submit the question to the House. Is there consent that the previous question shall be now considered as ordered upon the pending proposition, with the further understanding that the gentleman from Georgia have leave to occupy his time to-morrow?

There was no objection.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I ask further consent, that inasmuch as the bill of the minority has not been read, it be printed in the RECORD and be before the House to-morrow morning.

There was no objection.

The minority bill is as follows:

A bill to provide for the further distribution of the moneys received under the Geneva award.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all persons and corporations claiming any portions of the moneys now under the control of the United States, which were received from the Government of Great Britain in payment of the Geneva award, or as interest thereon, be, and they are hereby, authorized to sue for the same in the United States Court of Claims, at any time within one year from the passage of this act, in the same manner in which other claims are sued in said court; and the said court shall render judgment for each claimant for such amount only as, in their opinion, he shall be justly entitled to recover under said treaty and award according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations, but all payments heretofore made on any claim by the United States shall be deducted from the judgment to be rendered thereon.

SEC. 2. That in determining the amount for which judgment is to be rendered in favor of any claimant, interest shall be allowed at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum upon the amount of such claim from the date when the court shall in each case decide that the loss out of which the claim arose was sustained by the claimant; but in entering the judgment, the amount of principal and interest shall be stated separately.

SEC. 3. That such persons and corporations or the United States may respectively appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from judgments of the Court of Claims rendered under this act, and such appeals shall be in the form now prescribed by law.

The remainder of each judgment shall be paid at the expiration of three years from the passage of this act, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the recovery of such judgment; but if the sum of the judgments be greater than the moneys aforesaid, then the remainder of such judgments shall be paid ratably.

SEC. 6. That no claim which was provable under the acts organizing and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama Claims and was there duly presented, and was there adjudged, shall be provable under this act.

SEC. 7. That claimants under this act shall be admitted to testify in their own behalf.

SEC. 8. That appeals arising under this act shall take precedence of all other cases in the Supreme Court.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 12, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of February 2, 1882, a communication from the Chief of Ordnance in relation to the results of all trials and proofs of all guns of eight-inch caliber or upward, whether breech or muzzle loaders, and of all projectiles tested and proved under the act of June 6, 1872, to the present time, and what guns and projectiles of this kind are now on hand and untested or unexpended, &c.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the communication should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is in response to a resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] some time ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and if the committee desire the accompanying papers printed they can make a report with that recommendation. The papers are very voluminous, and will be referred without printing.

Mr. ALLISON. I call the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the matter. He has just come in.

Mr. MORGAN. Inasmuch as the appropriation bill relating to that special subject has passed the Senate, and I believe also the House, I ask that the communication lie upon the table until I can have a chance to examine it, and see whether it is proper to have any part of it, or how much of it, printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that the communication and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and let them examine it and see whether any of it ought to be printed, and if so, how much.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to that reference. I supposed I could relieve the committee of some trouble, however, by examining it without a reference.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no wish about it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the Senator from Alabama examine it himself, and determine upon the question of printing.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie on the table without printing.

Mr. ALLISON. There is a letter from the Secretary of War accompanying the communication?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. ALLISON. The letter perhaps should be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter had probably better be read. It will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, May 11, 1882.

SIR: Referring to so much of the resolution of the Senate, adopted February 2, 1882, as directed the Secretary of War to transmit to the Senate "a full report of the results of all trials and proofs of all guns of 8-inch caliber or upward, whether breech or muzzle loaders, and of all projectiles tested and proved under the act of June 6, 1872, to the present time, and what guns and projectiles of these kinds, with their cost, are now on hand and untested or unexpended, and what officers or agents of the Government are, or have been, personally interested in inventions or patents for the same," I have the honor to transmit herewith a communication from the Chief of Ordnance, dated the 10th instant, together with the following documents:

First. Report of Lieutenant-Colonel T. G. Baylor, president of the ordnance board, in permanent session in New York City, covering the scope of the resolution touching trial and proof of guns and projectiles, with accompanying drawings and explanations of experiments.

Second. A statement of experimental guns and projectiles on hand, with their cost.

Third. A statement of guns and projectiles of 8-inch caliber and upward on hand at forts and arsenals tested and proved since act of June 6, 1872, to the present time.

Fourth. A list of officers or agents of the Government who are or have been personally interested in inventions or patents for cannon and projectiles of 8-inch caliber or upward.

It is remarked that the scope of the resolution is conceived to embrace only guns of 8-inch caliber or upward and projectiles of the character which it was provided by the act of June 6, 1872, should be tested, and that it does not call for a report of the number and cost of guns of the calibers referred to, existing prior to the passage of that act of which there are about two thousand on hand, nearly all cast iron, smooth bore, muzzle-loading guns.

In response to that portion of the resolution directing the Secretary of War "to transmit to the Senate a full report of the action of the mixed board on ordnance" selected "to examine the inventions in relation to ordnance, and to report what inventions are worthy of test as well as the estimated cost of such tests" under the act of March 3, 1881, up to the present time, not heretofore printed, I have the honor to state that no preliminary report of the board's action in the premises has been received by this Department.

The act of Congress authorizing the selection of the board does not appear to have contemplated the making of any report by the board save a final report to be submitted to the Secretary of War for transmission to Congress.

The president of the board, under date of the 5th instant, informed this Department that this report may be expected on or before the 25th of the present month.

It will be at once transmitted to the Senate upon its receipt by this Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This letter will lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of citizens of Burlingame, Kansas, and a petition of citizens of Clyde, Kansas, praying an appropriation for the purpose of educating the native people of Alaska; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4704) for the relief of P. F. Lonergan, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GROVER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1320) for the relief of C. M. Wilcox, reported it without amendment.

He also submitted a written report on the bill (S. No. 1673) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to examine and report to Congress the amount of all claims of the States of Texas, Oregon, and Nevada, and the Territories of Washington and Idaho, for money expended and indebtedness assumed by said States and Territories in repelling invasions and suppressing Indian hostilities, heretofore reported by him; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1050) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River, reported it with an amendment.

ARKANSAS RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1020) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at the town of Van Buren, Crawford County, Arkansas, to report it with amendments. I am instructed also by the committee to ask for immediate action upon this bill, as the company that proposes to construct the bridge is now awaiting the action of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. If the bill is going to lead to any discussion, or take any time, I would beg the Senator from Missouri to let it go over.

Mr. VEST. I cannot see how it will lead to debate. The bill has been carefully prepared and submitted to the engineers.

Mr. HARRIS. If it shall not, I shall interpose no objection.

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Acting Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to reserve to myself the right to object to the consideration of this bill if it shall lead to debate. If it can be considered without debate I have no objection to its proceeding, but being charged with the bill which is the one regularly before the Senate on the Calendar, I am unwilling to give up the morning hour to this measure.

Mr. WALKER. It seems to me this bill will not lead to debate.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope not.

Mr. VEST. I do not see why it should.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. The first amendment of the committee is in section 2, line 6, after "United States," to insert "or for passengers or freight passing over said bridge;" so as to make the section read:

That any bridge built under this act is subject to its limitations, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States, or for passengers or freight passing over said bridge, than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to the said bridge; and it shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-roads in the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, after the word "accessible," in line 3, to strike out the following words:

Point, and the draw-spans shall not be less than one hundred feet in length in the clear; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river; and the spans shall not be less than five feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Navigable point, and the openings on each side of the pivot pier shall be not less than one hundred and sixty feet in the clear, and as nearly as practicable both of said openings be accessible at all stages of the water; that the spans shall not be less than ten feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge; that the piers and draw-rests of said bridge shall be built parallel with the currents at that stage of the river which is most important for navigation, and that no riprap or other outside protection for imperfect foundations be permitted to approach nearer than four feet to the surface of the water at its extreme low stage, or otherwise to encroach upon the channel-ways provided for in this act.

So as to read:

That said bridge shall be constructed with a draw or pivot span, which shall be over the main channel of the river at an accessible navigable point, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to insert, after section 3, the following additional section:

SEC. 4. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use; and in case the owner or owners of said bridge and the several railroad companies or any of them desiring such use shall fail to agree upon the sum or sums to be paid, and upon rules and conditions to which each shall conform in using said bridge, all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War, upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties: Provided, That the provisions of section 2 in regard to charges for passengers and freight across said bridge shall not govern the Secretary of War in determining any question arising as to the sum or sums to be paid to the owners of said bridge by said companies for the use of said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to change the number of section 4 in the bill to section 5.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 17, after the word "built," to insert the words "or condemned;" so as to read:

And until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be built or condemned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 6 the following:

That whenever the Secretary of War shall have good reason to believe that the bridge hereby authorized to be constructed is an obstruction to the free navigation of such waters, by reason of difficulty in passing the draw-opening of said bridge, by rafts, steamboats, or other water craft, it shall be the duty of the said Secretary, on satisfactory proof thereof, to require the company or persons owning said bridge to cause such aids to the passage of said draw-opening to be constructed, placed, and maintained, at their own cost and expense, in the form of booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures for the guiding of said rafts, steamboats, and other water craft safely through said opening as shall be specified in his order in that behalf; and on failure of the company or persons aforesaid to make and establish such additional structures within a reasonable time, the said Secretary shall proceed to cause the same to be built or made at the expense of the United States, and shall refer the matter without delay to the Attorney-General of the United States, whose duty it shall be to institute, in the name of the United States, proceedings in the district court of the United States in which said bridge, or any part thereof, is located, for the recovery of the cost thereof; and all moneys accruing from such proceedings shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

ACCOUNTS OF OFFICERS MAKING CERTAIN CHARGES

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Whereas charges have been filed with the Department of Justice against the integrity of Government officers and ex-Government officers in Alabama, concerning their conduct in office; and

Whereas it is alleged that officers of the Department of Justice and of the Treasury Department refuse to perform their duties in acting upon the accounts of persons who preferred said charges until said charges are withdrawn; and

Whereas it is alleged that said officers state they will not settle the accounts now pending before said Department of the person who preferred and filed said charges unless the same are withdrawn: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five members of the Senate of the United States be appointed by the President thereof to investigate the conduct of said officers; and that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time the result of its investigation.

Mr. INGALLS. Before committing myself to vote for this resolution, and thereby to an affirmation of my belief in the allegations made in the preamble, I should desire to be better informed as to the subject that is required to be investigated.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it ought to go over.

Mr. INGALLS. And for the purpose of obtaining further information, I would suggest to the Senator from Alabama to allow the resolution to be printed and lie over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. MORGAN. The subject has been brought to my attention by a Republican who resides in my State and has a good reputation for honesty and integrity in that State. He has been a deputy marshal of the United States for the northern district of Alabama. He asked me in a letter which he addressed to me to present this resolution, and he sent me an affidavit which I will send to the desk and ask to have read. After that, if the Senator from Kansas desires to have time to consider the resolution I shall have no objection.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, District of Columbia:

Before me, Fred. A. Grant, a notary public in and for District aforesaid, personally appeared the undersigned, Thomas G. Hewlett, who, being duly sworn according to law, says:

That he came to the city of Washington to get a settlement of his accounts with the Government.

That after several applications to the Department of Justice he was notified that his accounts would be adjudicated and examined by Mr. C. C. Lancaster, jr.

That on the 9th day of May, 1882, he called on Mr. Lancaster, at request of Mr. Brewster Cameron, for the purpose of examining his accounts for services as deputy marshal in the northern district of Alabama.

That Mr. Lancaster stated to him that if he would withdraw the portion of his charges against Marshal Sloss so far as they implicated Colonel Lowe that his accounts would then be examined and settled.

That the affiant told Mr. Lancaster that he could not see what the charges against Colonel Lowe could have to do with the money the Government owed him, and that the charges were true, and that he would not withdraw them for the sake of collecting the money which the Government justly owed him.

That Mr. Lancaster then said he would pay no attention to the affiant's account until the charges against Colonel Lowe were stricken out or withdrawn.

THOS. G. HEWLETT.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 11th day of May, A. D. 1882.

[SEAL.] FRED. A. GRANT, Notary Public.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas desire the resolution to go over?

Mr. INGALLS. I am still as much in the dark as to the necessity of appointing a committee of five Senators to investigate this matter as I was before the affidavit was read. I cannot see what there is that affects possibly any question that can come by any means, directly or indirectly, before the Senate. I therefore ask, in order that I may obtain further information, that the matter may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar will be called under the Anthony rule.

The bill (S. No. 1049) amending an act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States" was announced as first in order upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the report was called for yesterday.

Mr. HARRIS. It was called for by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] yesterday. Let the report be read.

The Acting Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HARRIS April 18:

The Committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of Epidemic Diseases, to which was referred Senate bill No. 1049, being a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases into the United States," has considered the same, and submits the following report:

The National Board of Health was created by act approved March 3, 1879, composed of one medical officer from the Army, one from the Navy, and one from the Marine Hospital Service, one officer from the Department of Justice, and seven members to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, not more than one of whom shall be appointed from the same State. And on the 3d day of April of that year the board organized and entered upon its duties.

By act approved June 2, 1879, additional powers were given and additional duties imposed upon the board, for the purpose of enabling it to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State from another, but by the terms of this act its duration was limited to four years from the date of its approval.

Some of the most important provisions of this act have proved inoperative, because they could not be enforced in respect to bills of health in foreign ports until the act as well as the rules and regulations made under it were regularly promulgated in such ports, and the authorities in some of the ports most dangerous to the health of this country would not allow their promulgation.

For the purpose of modifying and re-enacting the act of June 2, 1879, the committee instructs me to report the bill back with amendments and the recommendation that it pass.

The most material of the amendments to the act of 1879 is to require that the act and rules and regulations made under its authority shall be posted up in the office of the consul, vice-consul, or other consular officer of the United States, instead of formal promulgation, and to require all vessels sailing from foreign ports to any port in the United States to carry, as a part of the ship's papers, a bill of health signed by the consul, vice-consul, or medical officer of the United States at the port of departure.

The fullest and most reliable information as to the sanitary condition of foreign ports and vessels sailing from them, at the time of their departure, is absolutely necessary to enable our quarantine officers to distinguish upon arrival at our ports those ships and persons from which no danger need be apprehended, which form a very large majority of the whole, from the few ships and persons which are really dangerous, and which should be subjected to special scrutiny and, if necessary, treatment to secure safety.

This information can only be obtained by requiring vessels to have a reliable bill of health. This change in the law is earnestly recommended by the National Board of Health and approved by the National Academy of Sciences and almost if not every sanitary association in the country.

The sad experience of the country in repeated epidemics of yellow fever and cholera in the past and the spread of small-pox in many of the States of the Union at this time show the importance and necessity of this legislation.

No State or municipality can, in the exercise of their limited police powers, effectually prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State from another; but if their powers were fully equal to the necessities of the case, local boards of health and sanitary authorities are so much in sympathy with the commercial interests and influences of their respective localities that the people of the other States will not be content to rely upon them for protection.

The importation of contagion, or persons or goods infected with contagion, into this country from foreign countries, or into one State from another, is as much the creature of commerce as is the importation of a cargo of sugar or a bale of muslin; to do either is an act of commerce; indeed, it is commerce itself.

"Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States."

This bill does not propose to interfere in any manner or to any extent with the police regulations of any State or municipality. It proposes to act within a domain which the Constitution has placed beyond the reach of police regulations and State authority.

It proposes "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," and so to regulate it as to strip it from contagion, from the importation of which in times past the people of this country have suffered so often and so severely.

The experience of the last three years under the present law (inoperative as portions of it have been) inspires a high degree of confidence in our ability, by the strict enforcement of the necessary and proper regulations, to effectually prevent the recurrence of such epidemics in the future in the United States.

The protection of human life and the promotion of the public health are second in importance to no question which addresses itself to the consideration of the legislator, and Congress should, in the opinion of the committee, within the scope of its constitutional powers, adopt such measures as will most certainly preserve the one and promote the other.

Our statute-books furnish a large number of precedents wherein Congress has, within the last fifty years, regulated commerce with no other object or purpose than to give greater security to the health and lives of that portion of our people who chance to be afloat upon our waters.

It has required the inspection of the hulls, boilers, and machinery of steam-vessels, and forbidden the use of those found to be unsafe.

It has prescribed the maximum number of passengers which may be carried, and prohibited the carrying of articles dangerous to human life on passenger vessels.

It has for many years maintained, and is still wisely maintaining, a light-house system and a life-saving service. The former at an annual cost of about $2,500,000 and the latter costing annually about $700,000.

It has forbidden, under penalty of forfeiture and destruction, the importation of adulterated or impure drugs and medicines.

With these precedents of long standing and constant repetition before us, the committee does not deem it necessary to review the numerous judicial decisions which the committee believes clearly show the power of Congress to regulate commerce in respect to the importation of contagion, as well as in respect to the importation of other things, or to attempt to draw the line or define sharply exactly where the power of Congress to regulate commerce ends and the legitimate exercise of the police powers of a State begins.

Upon this point Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent case of Railroad Company vs. Husen, (5 Otto, 472, 473,) says:

"While we unhesitatingly admit that a State may pass sanitary laws and laws for the protection of life, liberty, health, or property within its boundaries; while it may prevent persons and animals suffering under contagious or infectious diseases, or convicts, &c., from entering the State; while for the purpose of self-protection it may establish quarantine and reasonable inspection laws, it may not interfere with transportation into or through the State beyond what is absolutely necessary for its self protection. It may not, under the cover of exerting its police powers, substantially prohibit or burden either foreign or interstate commerce. * * * The right can only arise from vital necessity, and it cannot be carried beyond the scope of that necessity."

This shows that the powers of a State in respect to this question are based upon and limited by the law of self preservation, and can go no further than the protection of the people within its boundaries, while the power of Congress to regulate commerce is absolute, supreme, and exclusive.

But wherever the line may be drawn, or to what extent the police powers of the States may be supposed to go, the bill reported by the committee does not propose to conflict, or in any way interfere, with any State or municipal board of health, or its rules and regulations. So far from it, it proposes to co-operate with them in the execution of all of their rules and regulations to prevent the importation of contagious diseases; and if in any case their rules and regulations are, in the opinion of the National Board, not sufficient to prevent such importation, then, under the order of the President, the National Board is authorized to make such additional rules and regulations as, in its opinion, are sufficient; and when approved by the President of the United States they become valid, and the State or municipal board is requested to execute and enforce them; but if it fails or refuses to do so, then the President is authorized to detail or appoint an officer of the United States to enforce them.

The report of the board of scientific experts appointed in December, 1878, shows that yellow fever has invaded this country sixty-five times within the present century, and that the proof conclusively shows that almost all of these epidemics were the result of imported contagion from countries south of us, while in no case is there satisfactory proof that the disease ever originated in this country.

From the best information that the committee has been able to obtain, it is of opinion that neither yellow fever nor cholera is indigenous to any part of this country, and that if we will adopt measures such as will effectually prevent their importation we will be free from them forever.

We have had State and municipal boards of health for very many years in the past, but we have also had epidemics of imported contagious and infectious diseases not unfrequently within the same period. If we would prevent these epidemics we must have a general system applicable to every port through which contagion can be imported, uniform in its requirements in respect to quarantine, and rigidly enforced, without regard to local commercial interests or influences, and the time for greatest vigilance in the enforcement of these preventive measures is when the country is entirely free from these diseases.

But even when they have appeared, the experience of 1879 has shown that with proper care and effort they can be confined within narrow limits, if not stamped out entirely. But to do this requires prompt action, and an amount of means rarely if ever at the disposal of a municipal or State board of health.

In the yellow-fever epidemic of 1878, which raged so fearfully and fatally at New Orleans, Memphis, Holly Springs, and Grenada, and extended far up the Ohio River, and to many other places, the actual loss to the people of the United States in the element of material wealth, to say nothing of impaired health and loss of human life, is variously estimated by those best informed on the subject at from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000.

In his message to Congress in December, 1878, Mr. Hayes said:

"The enjoyment of health by our people generally has, however, been interrupted during the past season by the prevalence of a fatal pestilence—the yellow fever—in some portions of the Southern States, creating an emergency which called for prompt and extraordinary measures of relief. The disease appeared as an epidemic at New Orleans and at other places on the Lower Mississippi soon after midsummer.

"It was rapidly spread by fugitives from the infected cities and towns, and did not disappear until early in November.

"The States of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Tennessee have suffered severely.

"About one hundred thousand cases are believed to have occurred, of which about twenty thousand, according to intelligent estimates, proved fatal.

"It is impossible to estimate, with any approach to accuracy, the loss to the country occasioned by this epidemic. It is reckoned by the hundred millions of dollars."

So gigantic in proportions and fatal in consequences was this epidemic that it produced general demoralization and panic, inducing all persons who could get away from the infected places to seek safety in flight, scattering throughout the country. Many of them were stricken down in other localities, thus spreading the disease over a large extent of country, producing a general state of apprehension and alarm, which prompted towns and villages, yet free from the pestilence, to establish shot-gun quarantines for their protection, thus blocking the ordinary channels of communication and transportation, suspending commerce, and paralyzing the entire business of the country.

The epidemic of 1879 at Memphis and New Orleans made its appearance before the national board had been able to perfect its plans of prevention; though it is, in the opinion of the committee, doubtful whether that epidemic could have been prevented, as it is not certain whether it originated from germs of the epidemic of 1878 which had survived or in fresh importation of the disease.

But, under the rules and regulations adopted by the board to deal with it, it was actually stamped out in New Orleans, and confined to the limits of Memphis; and instead of the general demoralization and panic, with suspension of business, trade, and commerce, which pervaded the country in 1878, commerce and communication with the infected cities were regulated, not stopped, or even retarded to any considerable extent, and the general business of the country went on in its usual methods, and through its usual channels, without serious interruption.

Instead of panic and alarm, confidence and a sense of security pervaded the country.

To illustrate, take the tonnage of a single railroad. The Illinois Central, at the one point of Cairo, sent to and received from the South in 1879, 100,470,000 tons of freight more than it received and sent for the same period in 1878, in addition to which the passenger trade was scarcely interrupted in 1879, while it was almost entirely suspended in 1878.

Dr. Rauch, secretary of the Illinois State board of health, from whose report the above statement is taken, says this result could not have been reached without the co-operation of the National Board of Health, and its utmost exertions were required to allay the fears of the local authorities.

The experience of the country during and since 1879 has inspired great confidence in the South and Southwest in the possibility of effectually preventing, or successfully dealing with and controlling, these epidemics.

The great transportation companies of the South, both river and rail, are unanimous in their approval of the action and methods of the national board in dealing with such cases, because experience has shown that they give the necessary security against the spread of disease, without stopping, or retarding to any considerable extent, commercial intercourse.

They have learned from their own experience that the certificate of the National Board of Health as to the sanitary condition of any city or place is accepted by other cities and States as testimony coming from a strictly impartial and well-informed authority, independent of all local interests or influences, commercial or otherwise.

The action and methods of the national board have been approved by the State and local boards of health throughout the country, almost without exception by the American Medical Association, the American Public Health Association, the National Academy of Sciences, the transportation companies of the South and Southwest, boards of trade, cotton exchanges, and other associations of business men throughout the country. In the opinion of the committee, it has accomplished much, and is capable of accomplishing highly important results of great benefit to the country, results which can be accomplished by no other agency.

For the greater security of the lives of that portion of our people who chance to be afloat upon our waters, given by our light-house system and Life-Saving Service, we annually expend about $3,200,000. This expenditure, necessary and proper, as the committee believes, is for the benefit of a very small proportion of our people, perhaps not more than one in a thousand, while the exertions and operations of the National Board of Health are intended to protect the lives and health, and certainly do benefit the whole people of the country.

If it be admitted that the action and operations of the board even tend to the preservation of life and health to any, however small the extent, such fact makes it eminently worthy of our support, and in the opinion of the committee should be sustained with such powers and means as will enable it to perform its functions fully, promptly, and efficiently.

The expenses of the board for the first three years of its existence ending April 3, 1882, aggregate $506,216.17, or an average of $168,738.72 per year, the whole expenditures for the three years being about $44,000 less than the amount appropriated for the first year.

Much the greater portion of these expenditures have been made in aiding State and municipal boards in their quarantine work, in the enforcement of quarantine regulations necessary to prevent the importation of contagion into the United States or into one State from another, and in establishing and maintaining quarantine stations at Ship Island and Sapelo Sound—at the former of which places the board found it necessary to construct a rude hospital, warehouse, and wharf of ample capacity, while at the latter they have used boats and tents.

These stations the board found indispensably necessary for the care and treatment of infected vessels, cargoes, passengers, and crews.

Under the regulations of the board a number of ships infected with yellow fever have been sent to these stations, and, after treatment, allowed to proceed to and enter our ports without giving rise to a single case of the disease.

When the memories of the fearful ravages of the epidemic of 1878 were fresh, both Houses of Congress were ready to appropriate, and did appropriate, all that the committee asked for the purpose of endeavoring to find, if possible, a means of preventing the recurrence of this terrible scourge; but as the memories of the hundred thousand sufferers and the twenty thousand new made graves of that period are fading from our minds, the committee has experienced more or less of difficulty in obtaining the appropriations necessary to enable the board to perform the important duties which devolve upon it.

The practical question, as it appears to the committee, is, the country being now free from yellow fever and cholera, shall we use the necessary means to keep it so, or relax into indifference, withhold the powers and the necessary means to prevent their importation, and await the outbreak of another epidemic, which will cost the country hundreds of millions of dollars and thousands of lives of our people, to awaken us to the importance of preventive measures in which the committee believes we can find absolute security?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Is it in order to interpose an objection to the consideration of the bill at any time? This bill is a very important one, and for myself I must confess I have not examined it as closely as I wish to do. It contains very important and very restrictive provisions, and I must object to its consideration.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will allow me to say to him before he interposes an objection, that this bill changes the act of June 2, 1879, in only two or three particulars. Almost every one of its provisions has been the law for the last three years. Those particulars in which that act is changed can be easily pointed out; and I hope when pointed out, as they are pointed out by the report, neither the Senator from New Jersey nor any other Senator will find fault or seriously object. There are reasons why it is very important that this bill should pass, and pass at the earliest day possible, that I will endeavor to assign if the Senator desires me to do so and will give me an opportunity of doing so.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill, but I cannot consent to its being voted upon until I shall have had more time to examine it.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill, but I do object to its being considered under the Anthony rule, and therefore, to enable the Senator from Tennessee to call it up so that it may be properly discussed, I shall ask that it may be taken up by the vote of a majority of the Senate, in compliance with the provisions of the amended Anthony rule, so that we may hear the explanation of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will withdraw my objection to its consideration, for that is the purpose.

Mr. HARRIS. One word as to the importance of its consideration, and then, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from New Jersey, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If objection is made, the motion can be made.

Mr. HARRIS. And not unless; but I understood the Senator from Kansas as interposing an objection.

Mr. INGALLS. To enable the Senator to make his motion, I will interpose now the objection, he understanding why I do it.

Mr. HARRIS. The particular reason I would assign——

Mr. ALLISON. This bill will take a week.

Mr. HARRIS. By no means; nor will it take as many hours or half hours as there are days in a week when the Senate come to understand it. But the reason why it is important that this bill should be considered at once and disposed of one way or the other is, first, that it is a well-known fact that within the last one or two months small-pox has been imported into this country through our ports to State after State, and several of the Western States have suffered seriously from the spread of the small-pox, traced with absolute certainty to the importation of the disease.

In addition to that fact, I have upon my table consular reports from Matanzas and Havana within the last ten days, showing that yellow fever is existing and increasing in both those ports, and that vessels are leaving those ports for ports in our country every few days, exposing us to the importation of the yellow fever into our Southern ports and threatening us with an epidemic this year perhaps equal to some of those we have had and suffered from in the recent past.

Let the action of the Senate be whatever it may in respect to this question, it is important in my opinion that they should act promptly; and if we intend to give the additional powers that this bill proposes to give to the National Board of Health as a means of preventing the importation of these diseases, let it be done at once, so that the country may avail itself of the benefit of this additional force the present season. If they do not intend to extend them, the sooner it is known the better, and therefore I hope the Senate will take the bill up and proceed with its consideration.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President I have no doubt that the bill relates to a most important and interesting subject, but I have also no doubt from the amount of scrutiny I have been able to bestow upon the measure that it will reach very distant results. The scope proposed of authority in this bill is one that I think needs a great deal of criticism; it needs a great deal of discussion. The importance of the subject I fully admit; but I submit now to the Senator from Tennessee that this is the morning hour, we have one hour from now to two o'clock to discuss this bill, and I would suggest to him that he had better have this discussion unbroken and have his bill acted upon either favorably or otherwise according to the judgment of the Senate, and not to attempt it in the morning hour. There is not time between now and two o'clock to discuss this bill. There are propositions here for an almost indefinite enlargement of the medical service of the United States, propositions here for which there are not to-day in the service of the United States enough physicians to fill the offices intended. There are here restrictions upon shipping and upon commerce of an exceedingly far-reaching and grievous nature. They cannot be discussed in a day. I submit to those gentlemen whose knowledge and whose local representation makes them peculiarly sensitive on commercial questions—for although we represent all parts of this Union in this Chamber still there are some more than others who feel themselves specially charged with the consideration of commercial interests—whether it would not be well for them to examine as to the effect of these restrictions upon commerce under the form and color of medical inspection.

The bill is important; I do not mean to prejudge it; but I do say that it had better be very carefully considered, and it cannot be properly considered in the space of one hour. At two o'clock another bill will be in order. I have glanced over this bill, and I confess myself somewhat surprised at the scope of authority that it proposes to the National Board of Health in the city of Washington. The proposition that they shall, if it is inconvenient to the President, appoint medical officers in every port where there is a consul or consular agent——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to say to him that I am perfectly willing to limit that number of medical officers to six, as now, for more than that number will not probably be necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform both gentlemen that discussion of the merits of the bill is not in order on this motion.

Mr. BAYARD. I say to my friend that I think it would be wiser, without regard to those in favor, or those opposed, to have so important a subject considered and disposed of properly, and not to attempt it in the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust Senators will not insist on taking this bill up now. I am surprised when I read the bill at the importance of the principles involved in it. If the language of the bill discloses its real meaning it places powers in the hands of the National Board of Health which I think entirely unnecessary, or at least they are so great and exorbitant in their character, according to the terms of the bill, that I should hesitate to vote for it without much longer consideration than we can give it in the morning hour. At the same time, I know that the National Board of Health has been a very useful agent to prevent the spread of diseases, and I wish to give them what powers are necessary. The bill ought to be taken up at some time when we can consider the matter fully. It will encounter very serious objection if pressed on the Senate at this time. I will either make an objection, or move to postpone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection has been made to the further consideration of the bill, and a motion is pending by the Senator from Tennessee that it be now taken up, notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I trust the Senate will not vote to take it up now, but let it stand on the Calendar without prejudice for the present, until we can examine it more fully.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to say to the Senator from Ohio that there is no bill on the Calendar so important as a question of time to be considered and disposed of at once, and I beg to call his attention to the additional fact that there is a very slight increase of power in respect to only one or two things that do not exist and have not existed for the last three years under the statutes of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee. There was an objection to the consideration of the bill, and thereupon a motion was made by the Senator from Tennessee, notwithstanding the objection, to take up the bill. The question is on that motion.

Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. McMILLAN. If this bill is taken up it will necessarily postpone the dispatch of all business that follows it upon the Calendar, business that would be unobjected to, that could be disposed of during the morning hour; while the remainder of the day could be appropriated to the discussion of this bill if it were taken up outside of the Anthony rule. The bill, as I understand it, if it is passed, not only will render perpetual the National Board of Health—now it is not so—but these powers will be made permanent and will be imposed upon the country then as they are not now.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator will allow me to suggest to him that the Board of Health is by law perpetual now. The powers given by the act of June 2, 1879, will expire on June 2, 1883, but the Board of Health exists and will only be stripped of such powers as that act gave.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is the view I had of the measure. I think if we are allowed to go on with business on the Calendar during the two hours appropriated to it we can dispose of the business before the Senate with much greater advantage to the country and appropriate to this bill the proper discussion which it will demand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To take up this bill and consider it. An objection having been made to its consideration under the Anthony rule, the motion is to take it up notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Several other bills I believe have been taken up under these circumstances, and I do not think any of them is of any more importance than this. Certainly none of them is of half the importance to my section of country as this bill. I trust the Senate will concur with the Senator from Tennessee and proceed to consider the bill. It is one of very great consequence, one to which the Senator from Tennessee has given a great deal of thought and study; and he has accompanied his bill by a very elaborate and full report. It seems to me that any Senator can fully inform himself in half an hour by reading that report and reading this bill. It is a matter of the very greatest consequence to the whole Atlantic and Gulf coast of this country that whatever we are going to do we do promptly. I hope the Senate will take up the bill and proceed to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that if the bill is taken up it will be the order, during the prevalence of the Anthony rule, until it is disposed of.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. This bill, if it becomes a law, will make some very important changes in the law as it now exists. One of those important changes has been pointed out by the Senator from Delaware. Under the present act the President is authorized to detail medical officers for the purpose of duty in foreign ports, but the number is limited to six. Under this bill the number is unlimited, and if the President finds it inconvenient to designate them for that purpose, then they can be appointed by the Board of Health.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to limiting it to six, as now.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not submitted any remarks on the merits of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate on the merits is not in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I was just going to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin was discussing the merits of the bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No, I was not discussing the merits but the demerits of the proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. Either form of the dilemma is violative of the rule.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am merely stating the condition of the bill because I am of the opinion that the Senate want to know something about the provisions of the bill in order to vote intelligently on the question of taking it up at this time.

Another change that is made by this bill is that the bill provides that the National Board of Health shall report directly to Congress. Under the present act they are required to report to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury communicates the report of the board to Congress. The object of this provision seems to be to make this, so far as it can be made under that provision, an independent, I was going to say department of the Government. I am of the opinion that if the Senator from Tennessee remains in the Senate three or four years longer and continues to work in the direction in regard to this matter that he has during the last three or four years, the National Board of Health will be made one of the departments of this Government. I do not express any opinion as to whether that ought to be done or not, but I think, judging the future by the past, that that thing will come to pass.

The bill not only authorizes the board to report directly to Congress, but it gives these doctors the franking privilege. That will be found on page 7:

> And that all mail matter of whatever class relative to the National Board of Health and its duties, and addressed to its secretary and indorsed "Official business, National Board of Health," shall be transported free of postage.

The bill provides also in the same section:

> That the necessary printing of the National Board of Health be done at the Government Printing Office, upon the requisition of the secretary of the board, in the same manner and subject to the same provisions as other public printing for the several Departments of the Government.

The present act provides that the printing shall be done at the Government Printing Office, but the cost is limited to $10,000. That provision is carefully eliminated in this bill, so that under the provisions of this bill the National Board of Health may order printing to any amount.

Mr. HARRIS. To an amount beyond its appropriation?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I believe it does not provide that it shall be paid for out of the appropriation.

Mr. HARRIS. Can any agency of the Government order work beyond its appropriation?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. We frequently pass deficiency bills, and I think it very likely——

Mr. HARRIS. We have never had one passed for the Board of Health.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think it likely that it will be necessary to provide a deficiency for that purpose. Section 8 provides:

> That the National Board of Health shall, as often as quarterly, make a full statement of its operations and expenditures under this act to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall report the same to Congress.

The present act requires that these expenditures shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. That is carefully omitted in this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss the provisions of this bill, but the Senator from Wisconsin has disclosed enough to show to the Senate that one session, or two, or three sessions, occupying the time intervening between half past twelve and two o'clock each day, will not suffice for the consideration of a bill of this importance, taking into account the provisions he has suggested.

If this is so important, as suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, why not take another time for it? Two o'clock will soon arrive, and then it will go over. We shall soon get rid of the pending regular order, and I suggest to him that he test the sense of the Senate in competition with other subjects before it when that is disposed of. If we are to have any efficacy in the Anthony rule at all we must eliminate from this morning hour bills of this character; otherwise we might just as well have no Anthony rule. The idea and object and aim of the Anthony rule is to take up during this hour such questions and bills as will not lead to general debate and discussion. We have a great number of them on the Calendar now, and if we are to have interpolated and injected a motion every morning for the consideration of every bill that is reached in its order, to which there is objection, of course the Anthony rule is entirely obliterated.

I hope, therefore, that whatever our opinions may be about this bill—and I have very little knowledge of it, and therefore very little information in reference to it—the Senate will not take it up this morning, but that it will run the gauntlet with other questions of importance before the Senate.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to call attention to one other provision. The proviso of the third section of this bill grants an unlimited power to the Board of Health to erect quarantine buildings, and for that purpose to acquire title to real estate without any restriction whatever.

Mr. HARRIS. That is the law now.

Mr. LAPHAM. I do not know any occasion for re-enacting it if it is the law now.

Mr. HARRIS. Because it expires in June.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to take up this bill notwithstanding the objection, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] for to-day.

Mr. GORMAN, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH,] with a perfect understanding that I should have the right to vote on all other questions. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. MILLER, of New York, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—24.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. The effect of this motion is to put this bill to the foot of the Calendar, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not come up under the Anthony rule any more.

Mr. HARRIS. So I understand. It will require a motion to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

ALBERT T. WHITING AND THOMAS EVANS.

The bill (S. No. 1561) for the relief of Albert T. Whiting and Thomas Evans was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that this bill should be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. VANCE. It may be postponed indefinitely, as a House bill for the relief of one of these gentlemen was amended by the Senate including the other.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

REGISTRATION OF TRADE-MARKS.

The bill (S. No. 1440) relating to the registration of trade-marks was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT. The bill was reported by the Committee on Patents. I propose an amendment to make it clear that it applies to nothing except what is now contemplated by the act relating to the registration of trade-marks. I propose to amend by inserting after the word "used," at the end of line 6, the words "by the applicant in foreign commerce or commerce with Indian tribes;" so as to make the bill read:

> That nothing contained in the law entitled "An act to authorize the registration of trade marks and protect the same," approved March 3, 1881, shall prevent the registry of any lawful trade-mark rightfully used by the applicant in foreign commerce or commerce with Indian tribes at the time of the passage of said act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD S. FARROW.

The bill (S. No. 881) for the relief of Lieutenant Edward S. Farrow, United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to ascertain the value of the property lost by Lieutenant Edward S. Farrow, Twenty-first Infantry, on or about the 8th of March, 1880, by the burning of the Government warehouse at Vancouver barracks, Washington Territory, in which building all the personal property of Lieutenant Farrow was stored for safe-keeping when he was sent into the field in pursuit of hostile Indians; and the amount so ascertained is to be paid.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment in line 16, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$1,657.05" and insert "$571;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no allowance shall be made for any property except what was useful, necessary, and proper for such an officer, and that the aggregate amount allowed shall not exceed the sum of $571.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask to have the report in that case read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAMPTON March 23:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 881) for the relief of Lieutenant Edward S. Farrow, United States Army, have considered the same, and beg leave to report the bill back to the Senate amended as follows: In lines 16 and 17 strike out the words "one thousand six hundred and fifty-seven dollars and five cents," and insert in lieu thereof the words "five hundred and seventy-one dollars." The committee have examined the list of articles lost by Lieutenant Farrow by the burning of the public warehouse, and while they do not doubt the correctness of this list they think that the Government cannot properly pay for all of these articles.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no showing here that Lieutenant Farrow was required to leave these articles in the Government warehouse. I do not understand that the Government becomes the insurer of the property of an officer, nor that it furnishes shelter and protection for his baggage or personal property wherever it may be found. By what right did Lieutenant Farrow put his baggage and his personal property into the Government warehouse; and now by what logic does he come here and ask, as the Government warehouse was burned down, that he should be compensated for the property he put there at his own option and at his own risk?

While this amount is not large, at the same time it is one of a very large number of bills that have been before the Senate recently, and it seems that we are establishing a very dangerous principle, one which is going to enlarge our obligations to the Army or to the officers composing the Army, and which practically makes the Government the custodian and insurer of all the property that any Army officer may have anywhere, either in pursuance of his Army duty or otherwise, which may be lost by fire, by flood, by theft, by burglary, or by any other casualty whatever. I submit that we are going a great way when, paying as we do a large salary to these officers, we relieve them from any obligation whatever of diligence or care or responsibility for the property which they find it necessary to have for the transaction of their business as officers of the Army. I submit that practically there is nothing which is absolutely necessary to an officer except his clothing.

Mr. COCKRELL. Arms?

Mr. PLUMB. Those he furnishes himself as he does his clothes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And a mess-chest?

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Kentucky says "and a mess-chest." I say there is no necessity for a mess-chest; but at all events, however that may be, we find that at this session tables, and desks, and books, and papers, and chairs, and lounges, and the frills and furbelows which are convenient to be used and which ornament the prairies in which they may flourish have been paid for, so far as the Senate can do it.

Of course, I have no hope that this can be resisted by what little I may do, but, as I said before, I submit that it is ingrafting a very dangerous practice on the principles of legislation, and for that reason I am opposed to this bill; and certainly, without some showing that this officer was required, of necessity, to put these goods in the Government warehouse, that there was no other place to put them, or that he put them there by direction of his superior officer in some way so that his own judgment was under the control of that superior officer, there is no foundation for an appropriation by the Government to pay for them.

Mr. HAMPTON. I had the honor of submitting the report in this case, but I do not at this moment remember the circumstances under which these articles were placed in the Government warehouse. I have just sent for the papers.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that the Committee on Military Affairs has never opened the door as widely as the Senator from Kansas would seem to indicate. They have universally held that losses of this kind must have occurred without any fault or neglect on the part of the officer, or he can have no claim to relief.

Mr. PLUMB. But the Senator from Missouri will permit me to say that the report here does not show anything of that kind.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is very true. I know that. I read the report before the Senator called attention to it. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] made the report. It was the understanding of the committee that these losses had occurred without any fault or neglect on the part of the officer, or I for one should certainly have voted against it.

Now another point the committee has been guarding constantly, not to pay for articles which may be lost which are not necessary; not in the sense that the Senator from Kansas says that they should be absolute necessaries, that is things which are absolutely indispensable. They could do without knives and forks; they could do without dishes; they could cook with sticks, and they could bake their bread on rocks, and they could do with very little clothing, and so on; but it is not supposed that in the nineteenth century the United States will require its officers to occupy that position, and therefore they are allowed to have ordinary necessary conveniences. They are to have clothing and arms and things of that kind that are reasonably necessary and proper for their health, their comfort, and their convenience. Those are the articles that we have restricted the pay to. Things that are not necessary, which are merely for ornament, for show, the committee have decided should not be paid for. Hence this amount is cut down, because there were a great many things included in his bill that were not necessary. We decided that a dress-suit for an officer on the frontier would not be a necessary article.

Mr. HAMPTON. I have now before me the papers, including the petition, of this officer, from which it will be seen—

That he was in the summer of 1879 on duty in the field, commanding a company of Indian scouts and detachment of United States troops, in pursuit of hostile Sheepeater Indians; that upon his departure from his regular station, Fort Townsend, Washington Territory, he had all of his personal property, which he is allowed by law, done up in boxes and bundles and placed them in the quartermaster's warehouse for storage and safe-keeping.

That warehouse was burned; and with these papers is a report of a board of officers, showing that no blame was attached to any one in consequence of the fire. This officer, Lieutenant Farrow, submitted a certified list of the articles which he lost. The amount of property covered by that list was $1,657. The committee have stricken out everything except what pertained to a soldier's outfit, his uniform, his arms, &c. But all the citizen's clothing, all his furniture, and everything of that sort they have recommended should not be paid for.

We regarded this as a most meritorious case, and I only regret that in making this report I was compelled by the rule the committee had adopted to recommend the payment only of those few articles which are embraced in this report, amounting to $571. More than a thousand dollars has been stricken off by this report that this gentleman loses, for we have no question in the world that he did lose that property. He loses entirely these articles of furniture and other things. I think the report is eminently just, and, as I said before, I only regret that a greater measure of relief cannot be granted.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to recommit the bill.

Mr. MAXEY. The only question raised by the Senator from Kansas, it seems to me, that has pertinence is the question of diligence or neglect. The committee have reduced this allowance down to the actual outfit of the soldier. In obedience to the orders of the Government he was compelled to leave that post and go on a scout. He placed his property in the best possible place he could place it, the safest place it could be, in the possession of the quartermaster, in the quartermaster's depot, where there is, as all military men know, constantly, day and night, a guard. That could not be the case at his own private quarters, because there a guard is not furnished.

On the question of diligence, he has used all the diligence that could possibly be expected of anybody. It is, therefore, a question whether, when an officer, obeying the orders of his Government, is compelled to leave his soldier's outfit behind him to go on a scout, and he does take care of it by the best means in his power, if he loses it, it would be equitable or fair that he should not be reimbursed. The committee thought he ought to be, and so reported. That is all there is in the case.

Mr. PLUMB. I smypathize with an officer of the Army who has to submit to the hardships of being ordered into the field; and on the whole, from the statement of the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Texas, it seems that this officer was so far imposed upon by the Government that whereas he was stationed at a comfortable place, where he was clothed and fed and sheltered by the Government, he was taken away at an unwary time, and probably at an unseasonable period of the year, when he would have much rather remained in this comfortable position, in order to go on an Indian scout. I think, on the whole, it was a little bit rough that an officer should have been compelled to do anything of that kind, and perhaps it may be that in point of fact the little sum of $571 for the baggage this officer lost having been placed in that locality upon his own option, and that the Government was under no obligation to take care of at all, ought to be given to him, not perhaps for loss of baggage, but as a compensation for the hardship that he had to undergo by reason of his having been ordered out to do that which he did not enlist to do at all!

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator is disposed to be somewhat sarcastic. I care nothing in the world about it. I never saw the officer, never heard of him before this case arose. He did obey the orders of the Government, and in doing that he lost the property. That is all there is in it. If the Senator has anything against the officer or against the service, that is his business, not mine.

Mr. PLUMB. The statement of the report, and the statement of the Senator who made it, and the statement of the Senator from Texas, who volunteers to say something in behalf of this bill, are all of them entirely apart from the objection which I made, and that is that the officer was under no compulsion to deposit his goods with the quartermaster. I go further, and say that the quartermaster was under no obligation to take care of them, and never has been, under any rule either of the articles of war or of the laws governing the Army.

Mr. VANCE. I think I can suggest something that will appeal to the sense of justice of the Senator from Kansas, and that is that the Government is bound to take care of the property of the officer on the established principles of its policy as a general insurance agent for all its citizens. A man starts a manufactory, and the Government lays a tariff to insure him against all possible loss; a man buys property at a marshal's sale, takes all the chances, and it turns out that he did not get any title and the Government repays him his purchase-money. Now, on the same principle the Government must repay an officer for all the property he loses in discharge of the duties he undertook to do. Is not that so?

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from North Carolina wants me to go into a discussion of the tariff-commission bill. [Laughter.] I am not going to be drawn off in that way. If he were to succeed in that he would compel me to tell him a story, which I will not here tell. But I want to say that in my judgment we are running this thing into the ground. An officer of the Army becomes a servant of the Government nominally, but actually he is no servant. He is designed, in the practice we are establishing, to do duty at balls, at picnics, and in various places where the social appliances which are in vogue in what the Senator from Missouri calls the nineteenth century demand his presence, and where he can exhibit himself in the paraphernalia and glitter of the blue of his uniform and the tinsel with which his shoulders and the stripes down his limbs ornament him. I think that when a man has enlisted for a soldier he ought to undertake a soldier's duty and a soldier's responsibility along with it. The Government does not agree to furnish him shelter for his baggage at all times and places when he happens to be away. If he should in the course of a few years' service happen to be ordered down, as though of course he feels that he ought not to be, upon a military expedition and is required to risk his body and his comfort and so on, in the pursuit of Indians or other enemies of the Government, I think on the whole, as long as he gets the benefits, he ought to take the burdens along with them, and he ought not to be too tenacious about his rights to his frills and furbelows and things of that sort which he may have left behind him.

There ought to be some just and fair relation established between him and the Government in regard to this question of the responsibility for luggage. If we are to vote these supplies, at least the committee which has charge of the subject ought to say either that the officer did not only the best that he could do, but the only thing that was left for him to do in order that his property might be properly taken care of. This opens the door in the widest possible way. His luggage may have been lost upon board ship, it may have been lost upon a wagon, he may have left it in charge of a servant, he may have lost it in a thousand ways; and the responsibility of the Government, if such a rule should be established, attaches absolutely and inevitably.

Mr. LAPHAM. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAPHAM. The Senate at this session passed a bill for the relief of Lieutenant Guy V. Henry, who was ordered into the Indian Territory, on account of the loss of his personal effects which were following him and were in the railroad storehouse at the city of Ogden and were destroyed by the burning of that storehouse without his neglect or fault. We passed a bill at this session giving him the value of the property which he lost, and I do not see any difference between that case and this.

Mr. PLUMB. If this matter is to be tried by precedent, I admit that the case is decidedly against me. What I am objecting to is the precedent; I am objecting to the principle. When it comes down to that, the obligation is just as much in favor of all volunteer officers. Here is the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] now under my eye, who served in the volunteer service, and who may perhaps have lost a dress-coat, or he may have lost a pair of boots, or he may have lost a pair of spurs; I know of plenty of officers who did; I was unfortunate myself, and lost property during the "late unpleasantness." I submit, in view of the looseness, as I conceive it, with which the committee now assumes liability to these officers, it is wonderfully tempting to thousands of officers who served in the late war to come in and say, "We were building a road at a certain time, or we had to go off unexpectedly when we would have preferred to stay in our tents or at our posts, and we lost personal property thereby, and now we want the Government of the United States to pay us for it."

As I said, it is not $571; it is the principle which we are establishing, it is to deepen and widen that which will cost us thousands and tens of thousands every year, because the very principle we establish has gone back and brought up a case occurring in 1858. We passed an act for the relief of a surgeon in the Army the other day for a loss which occurred in 1858, and there are thousands of such cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. If there are any men in the Army who are good for nothing but to dance, it does not appear that Farrow is one of them. If there are any men in the Army who ever shirk their duty—and I do not know any of them—it does not appear that Farrow is one of them. If there are any bills presented for losses which occurred in 1858, this is not one of them. If there are any of the numerous cases of abuse and nonsense supposed by the Senator from Kansas, the case of Farrow is not one of them, nor has the Senate so long as I have had any acquaintance with it, or the House, attempted to pay for such losses with the looseness indicated by the Senator's remarks.

This particular bill passed, I remember, in committee a very careful scrutiny. It does not appear that Farrow had any reluctance to go out in command of the scouts. I presume he is a gallant and brave young officer, like, I am very happy to say, all of them so far as I know; and I am sure the Senator does injustice to the regular Army in his general inferences of that character, if he will take the pains to consider the record of the last few years in this exceedingly disagreeable Indian service, which has a great deal of danger, a great deal of loss, without very much glory.

Farrow went out under orders in command of some scouts and did just exactly what a prudent and careful man would have done. He put his property in the best place there was, the Government warehouse under the care of the quartermaster. A Government warehouse usually has sentinels regularly posted and regularly relieved; therefore it was probably the best place anywhere in that vicinity. While he was out performing this duty his property was destroyed by a fire, for which it appears that nobody in the Army was to blame, so the board of survey found. He presented a bill for his losses. The bill was one thousand six hundred and odd dollars.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR Suppose instead of leaving this property in the Government warehouse he had left it in his home and it had been burned?

Mr. HAWLEY. That is not the case. That is all I have got to say in reply.

Mr. HOAR. Is it not this case in principle?

Mr. HAWLEY. No.

Mr. HOAR. Is there any reason why we should pay an officer for a loss by fire in the safest place he could get his personal property, because it happens to be left at some other place than his home, rather than if it was left at his home? What is the distinction?

Mr. HAWLEY. If it had been left in a private house it would be quite another case from this. All I have to say is that he took the best course possible under the circumstances. This is the distinction that gives this man an equity: an officer is not at liberty to dispose of his property or of his time as he pleases; he is obliged to obey an order, to go on the instant, leaving his property just where it is or putting it where he best can. It is upon that equitable ground that the Government does not allow him the exercise of the discretion of an ordinary citizen that this case appeals to me.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will allow me to ask a question, does he say that this being ordered away is a contingency which an officer has no right to expect by reason of his enlistment?

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman knows perfectly well that I take no such ground as that. He is liable to be ordered away at a moment; he is ready to go; and when ordered to go, he then does, as this officer did, exercise a wise discretion in the care of the property he leaves behind him; the property he must have. The committee struck $1,000 or $1,100 out of the bill, because that amount covered things really not necessary.

Mr. SLATER. I would not say one word but for the vein of sarcasm indulged in by the Senator from Kansas in respect to this young officer, whom I happen to personally know.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator will allow me, I said nothing about this officer at all. I referred to the fact set up, as I conceived, that this was to be considered an exceptional case because he had been ordered out on an expedition.

Mr. SLATER. That is true.

Mr. PLUMB. My entire remarks, which the Senator perhaps might by a stretch of imagination call sarcastic, were based upon the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Texas, that this officer ought to be paid because he was so ordered out. I do not know anything about this officer. I have no doubt he is a very good man. My objection is apart from any consideration to him personally.

Mr. SLATER. I understood that to be the position the Senator occupied. Still the reasonable inference would be that it must to some degree apply to this young officer. I wish only to say that this young man is not one of the Army officers, if we have such, who would shirk duty, responsibility, or danger. There has perhaps been no more dangerous deed performed by any Army officer in the last ten years than this young officer performed in the capture and taking of these very same Sheepeaters, which took place at the time when his property was burned. I am very sorry that the committee cut down the bill, but I am willing to accept the action of the committee. This young man is a very worthy officer, and the loss was a very severe one. I hope the bill will not be recommitted to the committee.

Mr. HAMPTON. I wish to call attention to one point that I did not refer to before, as I did not have time to do so. This officer had left his property at Fort Townsend, and while he was away, as the company was ordered to change its quarters, being moved a distance of two hundred miles, the Government took his property and carried it to Vancouver, and there it was burned, not at the place where he left it at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The bill (S. No. 1562) to constitute the Department of Agriculture an Executive Department and to enlarge its powers and duties was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] who reported the bill is not now in his seat. A similar bill which has passed the House is before the Committee on Agriculture. I ask that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order, if there be no objection.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the same order be taken in regard to the succeeding bill on the Calendar, the bill (S. No. 593) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle and the spread of infectious or contagious diseases among domestic animals. It is on a cognate subject and I think will come up in connection with the bill for the establishment of the department of agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order, if there be no objection.

NATIONAL-BANK CURRENCY.

The bill (S. No. 1353) to prohibit the issue of bank notes or currency by national banks which may be organized or reorganized after July 1, 1882, was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. That bill was reported adversely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over and the next bill on the Calendar will be announced.

REFUNDING OF INCOME TAX.

The bill (S. No. 1068) for the relief of certain citizens of Tennessee was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remit, refund, and pay back, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following-named citizens of Tennessee, or the legal representatives of such as are deceased, the amount of taxes assessed upon and collected from the said named persons contrary to the provisions of the regulations issued by the Secretary of the Treasury under date of June 21, 1865, and published in special circular numbered 16 from the Internal Revenue Office, of that date, said refunding having been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury under date of June 19, 1873, that is to say:

To William Campbell, $8.96, &c.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Acting Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HARRIS on the 24th of March:

The Committee on Finance, to which were referred Senate bills Nos. 1068 and 1111, have considered the same, and submits the following report:

The parties named in the substitute herewith reported were in 1863 and 1864 resident in the counties of Williamson, Rutherford, Bedford, and Warren, in the State of Tennessee.

The county of Williamson is immediately south of and adjoining Davidson, in which Nashville is situated.

Rutherford is southeast of Nashville and adjoining Davidson and Williamson. Bedford is southeast of and adjoining Rutherford, and Warren is east of and about eighty miles from Nashville.

Under section 90 of the act of July 1, 1862, an annual tax on all incomes over $600 and under $10,000, of 3 per cent., and on all incomes of over $10,000, a tax of 5 per cent. was imposed. (See 12 Statutes, page 473.)

The forty-sixth section of the act of June 30, 1864, provides "that if for any cause, at any time after this act goes into operation, the laws of the United States cannot be executed in a State or Territory of the United States, or any part thereof, it shall be the duty of the President, and he is hereby authorized, to proceed to execute the provisions of this act within the limits of such State or Territory, or part thereof, so soon as the authority of the United States therein shall be re-established, and to collect the taxes, duties, and licenses in such States and Territories under the regulations prescribed in this act, so far as applicable; and when not applicable the assessment and levy shall be made and the time and manner of collection regulated by the instructions and directions of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury." (13 Statutes, page 240.)

The joint resolution of July 4, 1864, imposed a special tax of 5 per cent. on all incomes over $600, in addition to all other taxes, for the year 1865. (13 Statutes, page 417.)

Under the authority of section 46 of the act of June 30, 1864, above quoted, on the 21st June, 1865, the Secretary of the Treasury issued Regulations, Special No. 16, "concerning the collection of taxes in States lately in insurrection," as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
June 21, 1865.

Section 46 of the internal-revenue act approved June 30, 1864, provides that whenever the authority of the United States shall have been re-established in any State where the execution of the laws had previously been impossible the provisions of the act shall be put in force in such State, with such modification of inapplicable regulations in regard to assessment, levy, time and manner of collection as may be directed by the Department.

Without waiving in any degree the rights of the Government in respect to taxes that have heretofore accrued, or assuming to exonerate the tax-payer from his legal responsibility for such taxes, the Department does not deem it advisable to insist at present upon their payment, so far as they were payable prior to the establishment of a collection district embracing the territory in which the tax-payer resides.

But assessors in the several collection districts recently established in the States lately in insurrection are directed to require returns, and to make assessments for the several classes of taxes for the appropriate legal period preceding the first regular day on which a tax becomes due after the establishment of a district; that is to say, in the several districts in question the proper tax will be assessed upon the income of the year 1864, inasmuch as the tax for that year is due upon the 30th day of June subsequently to the establishment of the district. All persons found doing any business for which a license is required will be assessed for the proper license from the first day of the month in which the district is established.

Persons engaged in any business for which monthly or quarterly returns are required to be made will be assessed for the month or quarter for which returns should be made at the first return day after the establishment of the district; and the same principle will apply to those taxes which are payable at different periods. A manufacturer of tobacco, for instance, in a district established after the 1st and before the 20th day of May will be assessed upon his sales for the month of April.

When any manufactured articles are found in the hands of a purchaser, and it is shown to the satisfaction of the assessor that the goods were actually sold and passed out of the hands of the manufacturer before the commencement of the period for which he is properly taxable, the articles will not be subject to tax in the hands of such purchaser, unless transported beyond the limits of the States lately in insurrection.

The holder of any distilled spirits, manufactured tobacco, or other article which is liable to seizure on account of the absence of inspection marks, may present to the assessor the evidence that the articles in his hands, or, under the circumstances which obtain in the particular case, are not subject to tax, except as above stated; and, if the assessor is satisfied, he will cause the packages to be so marked that they may be identified and sold without liability to seizure.

Whenever any collector shall have reason to believe that the holder of any goods on which the tax has not been paid intends to remove the same beyond the limits of the States lately in insurrection, and to evade the payment of the tax, he will seize the goods and take necessary steps for their condemnation, unless the holder shall give bond, as hereinafter prescribed, for the transportation or exportation of the goods, or shall return the same to the assessor, and pay to the collector the amount of tax that shall be found due. In all cases in which a seizure shall be made under these instructions, the Department, on being informed of such seizure, will consider the case, and extend such measure of relief as the facts shall justify.

In the States of Virginia, Tennessee, and Louisiana collection districts were some time since established, with such boundaries as to include territory in which it has but recently become possible to enforce the laws of the United States. In those districts the rule laid down above will be so modified as to require the assessment and collection of the first taxes which become due after the establishment of assessment divisions in the particular locality.

Whenever assessments are to be made based upon transactions which may have been carried on in a depreciated currency, it will be proper for the assessor to ascertain the amount of the income, or value, or sales, or receipts in lawful money of the United States, according to the best information which he can obtain as to the average value of such depreciated currency for the period covered by the assessment.

The duties upon cotton and spirits of turpentine are, by a special provision of the statute, made payable by the person in whose hands the articles are first found by officers of internal revenue. With reference to those articles, therefore, the rule laid down will not apply, but assessments will be made wherever they are found.

Whenever any person holds, as a purchaser, any articles which, under the internal-revenue laws, may be transported under bond, and desires to transport the same to any Northern port or place, he may apply to the assessor to have the amount of tax ascertained and determined. The proper examination having been had, the assessor will certify the amount of duties thereon to the collector, and the collector will thereupon grant a permit for their removal, after the execuiton of a bond for their storage in bonded warehouse, such permit and bond being in the form required by the regulations for the establishment of bonded warehouses. On or before the 10th day of each month the assessor will transmit to the Office of Internal Revenue a statement showing the amount of duties thus certified during the month preceding, and the collector will, on or before the same date, transmit a descriptive schedule of all bonds thus taken by him in the course of the preceding month.

When goods arrive in any Northern port under such transportation bond, or under a permit issued by a collector of customs, under the regulations of May 9, 1865, they will be received into the proper warehouse, established under the internal-revenue laws, in the district into which the goods are brought, and the necessary certificates will be issued for the cancellation of the bond, in the same manner as if the goods were transported from another bonded warehouse. Whenever any person who is assessed for a license is found to have paid a license tax to a special agent, appointed under the regulations of the Treasury Department for commercial intercourse with insurrectionary districts, the collector will issue a license for the year ending May 1, 1866, and will collect only so much as may be due for the time intervening after the expiration of the license issued by the special agent.

The amount assessed and thus left uncollected will be abated when the proper claim is presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

H. MCCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The eighth paragraph of these regulations distinctly provides that in districts where it has but recently become possible to enforce the laws of the United States the rule shall be to require the assessment and collection of the first taxes which become due after the establishment of assessment divisions in the particular locality.

The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows that assessment divisions and assistant assessors for these divisions were established and appointed as follows: for the county of Williamson, June 30, 1864; for the county of Rutherford, August 30, 1864; for the county of Bedford, January 1, 1865, and for the county of Warren, September 8, 1865.

Under the provisions of section 91 of the act of July 1, 1862, the annual tax on incomes was leviable and collectible on the 1st of May for the year ending 31st December preceding.

And under joint resolution of July 4, 1864, the special tax on incomes for 1863 was leviable and collectible on 1st October, 1864.

The first taxes that could become due in these counties under the provisions of the eighth paragraph of Regulations Special No. 16 were the taxes for the counties of Williamson and Rutherford for the year ending December 31, 1864, to be assessed and collected on 1st May, 1865; assessment divisions having not been established in these counties until June 30, 1864, in the first, and August 30, 1864, in the latter.

And for the counties of Bedford and Warren the taxes for the year ending December 31, 1865, leviable and collectible on the 1st May, 1866; assessment divisions having been established in these counties January 1 and September 8, 1865.

It is a historical fact that from some time in March, 1862, to the close of the war, the city of Nashville was continuously held by a garrison of the United States Army, and that the battle in front of Nashville occurred on the 16th December, 1864, and that the counties of Williamson, Rutherford, Bedford, and Warren were alternately held, sometimes by the one and sometimes by the other belligerent.

The condition of affairs being such as to render it impossible to enforce the laws of the United States by any civil process until the beginning of the year 1865, the civil authorities being paralyzed and the citizens powerless, he promptly complied with whatever demands were made upon him by any real or pretended official when backed by military power.

Taxes for the year 1863, in the respective amounts named in the bill, were assessed against and collected from the parties named, in the years 1864 and 1865, the assessment and collections having been made by parties running out into the country under military protection and making their demands, and immediately returning to the garrison.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue reports that claims for refunding these taxes were filed in his office prior to June, 1873, and therefore claimants are not barred by the forty-fourth section of the act of June 6, 1872, 17 Stats., p. 257.

In June, 1873, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue submitted these claims to the then Secretary of the Treasury for consideration and advice. And on the 19th June, 1873, Secretary Richardson returned the claims to the Commissioner, with the opinion that the collections were not illegal and therefore could not be refunded by the Department, but in his letter said:

"I fully recognize the hardship of the case and desire that such claimants may receive relief from Congress. I have therefore to suggest that you will in your next annual report, or on any other occasion which you may deem more fitting, recommend the passage of a special act authorizing the refunding of all taxes paid by residents of the insurrectionary States, which under the Department circular of June 21, 1865, should not have been collected. Such refunding to be made whether the tax in question was collected before or after the issue of the circular."

In this recommendation Secretary Richardson evidently recognized the hardship and injustice of the Government demanding taxes from citizens whom it did not and could not protect.

Every consideration of justice demands that these taxes, collected as they were in violation of the principles of the eighth paragraph of special regulation No. 16, should be refunded.

The committee therefore reports the bill back with an amendment in lieu, prepared in strict conformity to the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the recommendation that the amendment be adopted and the bill passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, the bill goes over, and the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 4197) re-establishing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6004) making an appropriation to construct a road and approaches from Mound City, Illinois, to the national cemetery, and for other purposes.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BECK. Yesterday I offered a resolution and gave notice that to-day, if the court of appeals bill was finished yesterday I would ask to be heard for half an hour or so. I do not expect to interfere now with the unfinished business, but I desire to renew the notice that if the Senate does not meet to-morrow, on Monday at two o'clock I shall endeavor to obtain the floor for that purpose.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the bill (H. R. No. 3082) granting condemned cannon to the Anna M. Ross Post No. 94 of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] had the floor last night, but if he will indulge me one moment I will ask, if it pleases the Senate, that the bill be taken out of Committee of the Whole, and subject to amendment in the Senate before the Senator proceeds; and also that my friend from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] renew the amendment which he intends to offer in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) If there be no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. There was an amendment offered and rejected yesterday which I should like to have reserved for a separate vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not in a condition to be reserved, having been rejected, but the Senator may offer it in the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. If I can offer the amendment in the Senate that is all I desire.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How shall the vote be taken upon concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BAYARD. I suppose such as are desired will be voted upon separately.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That can be done after four o'clock. Some Senators desire to speak, and I do not wish to take up time now on the amendments.

Mr. PENDLETON. The amendments may be reserved, then.

Mr. BAYARD. That may be so, but I desire to explain one amendment; and when four o'clock arrives shall I lose the right of debate? I merely desire to explain an amendment which I hope to be able to do to the satisfaction of the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question will be on concurring in amendments made as in Committee of the Whole; after which the bill will be open in the Senate to any amendment any Senator may see proper to offer.

Mr. BAYARD. Upon the pending question I can say what I desire to say now.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] has the floor.

Mr. BAYARD. I beg pardon.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, the opposition to the bill before the Senate has been expressed in such strong language by Senators for whose opinions I have the highest respect that I feel constrained to consume a short time in stating the reasons that impel me to support the bill.

The bill has been subjected to the most searching examination, and after some amendments it has reached a final analysis and the vote is ready to be taken on its passage. Some provisions and omissions in the bill are not satisfactory to me, but having exhausted all efforts to perfect it by amendments, which I supported, the question is, Shall our Federal judiciary and the laws creating inferior courts and defining their jurisdiction and the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court stand as they are, with all their acknowledged imperfections, or shall they be amended and changed as proposed in the bill before the Senate? The answer to this question depends upon whether the bill as it is corrects any of the defects and remedies any of the evils of the existing system. Are the changes made by the bill an improvement?

I shall not attempt to reproduce or add to the exhaustive arguments in support of the bill, or those made in favor of the many plans and amendments that have been discussed and condemned by the Senate.

I shall vote for the bill in its present shape because I am satisfied that in many respects it is an invaluable improvement of our Federal judiciary as it is now organized. It is conceded without question that the vast accumulation of cases in the Supreme Court of the United States has seriously impaired the ability of that court to carry out the objects for which it was established, and that without some remedial legislation this co-ordinate department of the Government will become permanently disabled by the constantly increasing pressure of its business to meet the demands of public and private justice. The duty and obligation are imperative and rest alone upon Congress to provide a remedy. It is useless to delay action until we can decide what is the cause and who is to blame for this disabling accumulation of business in the Federal courts. It is manifest that these courts have been overloaded by laws enlarging their jurisdiction. Whether this increase of jurisdiction was right or wrong, wise or unwise, necessary or unnecessary, are questions about which we differ in opinion.

It may be that an increase in such jurisdiction was justifiable under the new conditions in some cases, and in others that it was necessary and unavoidable. But it is now equally evident that a large portion of the jurisdiction conferred upon Federal courts by acts of Congress during and since the war can be safely restored to and made exclusive in the State courts, and thereby relieve the existing pressure and greatly improve our complex judicial system. The failure to secure this desirable reformation in the bill before the Senate is not a sufficient reason to my mind for refusing to do the best we can and going as far as we can in the direction of beneficial judicial reform. Hereafter we can renew our efforts and make such further changes in existing laws conferring jurisdiction upon Federal courts as the good sense and wisdom of Congress may sanction. I have no hope, however, that any reduction that may be made hereafter in the subjects of the jurisdiction of Federal courts will dispense with the necessity of some intermediate appellate tribunal to arrest the increasing flow of business into the Supreme Court. But, Mr. President, the controlling consideration for my support of the bill before the Senate is furnished in those provisions which secure the right of appeal and writs of error in civil and criminal cases where no such right is allowed by existing laws. As the law now stands there is no right of appeal to the Supreme Court in any civil case (except some special cases) unless the amount in controversy is $5,000. The bill before the Senate allows an appeal from any final judgment or decree in any civil case in the circuit or district court to the new court of appeals where the amount in controversy is $500.

But some Senators seem exasperated at the possibility of the passage of the bill before the Senate because it denies the right of appeal from the district court to the circuit court in equity cases, and a writ of error in civil cases in the district court to the circuit court involving over fifty and less than five hundred dollars. I would share their feelings myself at such a change in existing law if I considered the right of any real value to the parties interested. But upon examination of the statute allowing equity proceedings in the district courts from which appeals can be taken and civil suits in the district courts in which writs of error are authorized to the circuit court where the amount involved is over fifty and less than five hundred dollars, I find that such proceedings are not likely to be had in the district courts of Alabama in which any appeal or writ of error would be desired by any defendant in any ten years to come, for the reason that the subjects of such jurisdiction are exceptional and very rarely give rise to litigation, and the appeal and writ of error lie only to the circuit court, as will be found by reading the several subdivisions of section 563 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. I have never known of such actions myself in any district court, and I cannot believe that the right of a rehearing in the circuit court is of any considerable value to the parties interested. But be this as it may, I do not feel that I am doing injury to any class by suspending until it can be restored, if found hereafter to be of any value, the right of appeal in such cases in exchange for the much more valuable right to the same class of appealing in all civil cases that are being brought every term of the district and circuit courts in large numbers, involving $500, where no right of appeal is now allowed to the Supreme Court.

Then, again, there is opposition to the bill because it allows no appeal from the new court of appeals to the Supreme Court, except in cases involving $10,000.

This feature of the bill is objectionable, and so is the existing law, and greatly more so, which denies all right of appeal from a circuit or district court in cases involving less than $5,000.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Would it be inconvenient to the Senator for me just on that point to ask him a question? I do not wish to interrupt him at all.

Mr. PUGH. I prefer that the Senator should wait until I get through. It may interfere with the arrangement of my remarks for me to yield to inquiries and suggestions.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Very well.

Mr. PUGH. I do not know what the question is, but I will endeavor to answer it when I get through, if the Senator wishes to ask it then.

But which right of appeal in civil cases is most valuable to the mass of people of all classes and conditions I partly represent: the right of appeal secured by this bill, in all cases involving less than $5,000, to the new court of appeals, or the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, in cases involving over $5,000, as allowed by existing law? I decide without hesitation to accept for the people of all conditions the right secured by this bill of appealing to the new court of appeals in all civil cases involving less than $5,000 rather than keep the right now given them by law of appealing to no court unless the amount involved is over $5,000.

The law as it will be, should this bill pass, is as much open to repeal or amendment as the existing law. It is just as easy to secure by amendment hereafter the provisions we are so anxious to incorporate in this bill as it would be to change hereafter the acknowledged imperfections in the present law. So that the question recurs, is the bill before the Senate a beneficial change of the law as it now exists? This question I have answered as to the right of appeal in civil cases. Now, as to the more important right in criminal cases, I desire to call attention to the fact that no reduction of the jurisdiction of Federal courts has been proposed, or can be proposed, that will take away their jurisdiction over the revenue and election and timber laws of Congress, and the enforcement of the criminal enactments in these statutes, and it is in this jurisdiction of the circuit and district courts of the United States that is found the means and the power of persecuting and oppressing the people of Alabama and all the other Southern States.

The bill before the Senate furnishes a chance for relief and protection never before offered against these persecutions and oppressions, by securing to the defendant the right to a writ of error by which the erroneous rulings and judgments of district and circuit judges in all criminal cases can be carried to an appellate court composed of six judges. And the judge whose rulings and judgments are complained of has nothing to do with granting or refusing the writ of error, and can take no part in the revision of his own rulings and judgments by the appellate court. The objections urged against the bill before the Senate have not a feather's weight in my mind when compared with the invaluable practical right and benefit it secures in the writ of error in all criminal prosecutions that would be lost to the people of the South by the defeat of this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Does my colleague call that a right which a man has to pray for by petition?

Mr. PUGH. I do.

Mr. MORGAN. It is the right to pray, not the right to demand.

Mr. PUGH. The same petition sets out the facts that would be stated in a bill of exceptions, and would present precisely the same causes of error.

Under existing laws there is no right of appeal or writ of error to any court from any criminal case in the circuit court, or district court acting as a circuit court, although it involves the reputation, liberty, or life of the defendant. A district judge like Bruce is described to be in Alabama, and a circuit judge like Bond is described to be in South Carolina, may disregard the law and sacrifice the liberty and life of the citizen by unlawful rulings and judgments, induced by partisan and it may be other corrupt motives, and there is no remedy. The defendant has no right of appeal or writ of error to any court and must suffer the punishment. Money and property, without regard to the character of the questions involved, are secured a standing in higher and safer and more accurate scales of justice than the most sacred right or principle not based on $5,000, or than the liberty and life of the citizen. Any bill that contains provisions that promise any protection and relief from such intolerable outrages and oppressions in criminal prosecutions under existing laws, and such gross inequalities in civil cases, must have many vital imperfections in other respects to drive me from its support.

But some Senators declare their inability to support the bill before the Senate because it increases the power of district and circuit judges by making them a component part of the new court of appeals. I have exerted the powers of my mind to discover the force of this objection, and feel constrained to acknowledge my inability to understand how the power of these judges to do mischief is increased in the least possible degree by their being made a part of the new court of appeals. If the bill before the Senate fails to become a law then Judge Bruce, and those like him, remain as they are, with all their powers and jurisdiction as district judges and as circuit and quasi circuit judges. With these powers and jurisdiction secured to them by the law as it is, and as it will be if the bill before the Senate fails, Judge Bruce and those like him can go on as they have done in their work of oppression and persecution of parties in their court, and there is no power or tribunal to molest or make them afraid. They can impanel juries in utter disregard of the law of Congress, and prescribe rules for their qualification and selection unknown to law or criminal procedure, to insure conviction. They can usurp the powers of the jury and impose upon jurors, as law for their government, rules that would not be recognized or sanctioned by any honest judge or court. They may render final judgment and pass final sentence in criminal prosecutions depriving an innocent man of liberty or life, and there is no remedy. The wrong, the judicial outrage, goes uncorrected. The judgment and sentence stand undisturbed as an infamous finality.

How is Judge Bruce's power increased to perpetrate such irreparable wrongs and to commit such judicial crimes by creating a tribunal composed of one associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States and three circuit judges and two district judges? Suppose Judge Bruce and those like him are members of the new court of appeals, with power to revise their own judgments from which the appeal is taken, they would have to obtain the concurrence of two circuit judges or one circuit judge and the judge of the Supreme Court before they could secure affirmance of their judgments by an equally-divided court. But under the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] Judge Bruce would have no power or authority as a member of the new court of appeals to take any part or cast any vote on the revision of his judgments or decrees.

In the court of appeals he would be silenced when his acts and judgments were under revision. It is unreasonable to believe that the mere fact of his being a member of the appellate court, without authority to act or vote, would secure in every appeal an affirmance of his judgments and decrees, however erroneous or outrageous. It would require an affirmance in every case involving his own judgments to make his power equal in the court of appeals to what it is now and what it would be as district judge if the bill before the Senate is defeated. If there is no court of appeals, Judge Bruce may make himself the peer of Jeffreys in his rulings and judgments in his own or in the circuit court, and he can laugh at your criticisms and criminations in the Senate or elsewhere, and indulge himself at his own will and pleasure, without restraint or interruption in the scope of his own jurisdiction.

We have Associate Justice Wood of the Supreme Court as part of the new court of appeals in the fifth circuit. Judge Wood was circuit judge in that circuit for six or eight years, and with nearly the unanimous recommendation of the bar of Alabama he was nominated by the President and confirmed by this Senate as one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court. Will he leave behind him the pride and distinction and responsibility and influence of his high position as a member of the most august judicial tribunal in the world and allow himself to be transformed into a Jeffreys by association with Judge Bruce in the new court of appeals? I trust he will not—I venture to say I know he will not. And then there is Judge Pardee, the present circuit judge for that circuit. He was confirmed by this Senate in his present office, and my information is he has given general satisfaction in his administration as circuit court judge. He would be one of the members of the new court of appeals. Does it not improve the chances of relief from the perils and wrongs that may attend the exercise of the unbridled jurisdiction of Judge Bruce for his victims to have the right in all criminal cases to a writ of error if the facts set out in a bill of exceptions entitle them on application to such writ to carry the case to a new court of appeals made up in part of Justice Wood and Judge Pardee? I answer in the affirmative, whatever others may think.

But the Trojan horse found in the bill by my brother Democratic Senators is that provision authorizing and requiring the appointment of eighteen additional circuit court judges. Some fear and others have no doubt that all those judges will be Republicans, nominated and confirmed because they are Republicans. If all these judges were to be Democrats or all Republicans, or an equal number members of the two national parties, how would such personnel or politics of the new court of appeals affect the merits or operation of the law as a measure of judicial reform? The sworn obligation of the judges will be to obey the Constitution and administer justice according to law. Whether this obligation will be discharged or not must depend upon the capacity, law, learning, and personal integrity of each judge composing the court. With these qualities we have the highest assurance attainable in human affairs that justice will be administered according to law. The politics of a court composed of such judges as I have described would make no difference in results, except where constitutional construction and limitations of Federal power were involved in the decision. In respect to such questions, the Supreme Court has original and appellate jurisdiction to render final and conclusive judgment, and it is now composed of eight Republicans and one Democrat; so that when it comes to a final solution the truth is that the real merits and operation of the bill, should it become a law, cannot be materially affected by the personnel or politics of the new court of appeals if the judges have the capacity, learning, and integrity indispensable to judicial qualification.

As Senators, discharging a high duty to devise the best remedies for mischievous and ruinous imperfections in our Federal judiciary, how can we allow our votes for or against a measure to be influenced by the consideration that when the bill becomes a law the President, in the appointment of officers to execute it, and the Senate, in the confirmation of such appointment, will discriminate in favor of the Republican party? It seems to me that the only question to be decided is whether the bill before the Senate is entitled to our support on its merits without reference to whether proper judical officers will be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

The selection of the judges is to be made after the bill becomes a law. The President is to nominate the eighteen persons, and whether he will select all of them from the Republican party, as he will if he follows alone the antecedents of his party, or take half from the Democratic party, we cannot know and have no right to have determined beforehand, unless we make it a part of the law that each political party shall have the same number of the judges to be appointed. But such a provision would be at once objected to as being very improper to have any place or recognition in legislation relating to the improvement and perfection of our judicial system.

Why is it that the common sense and intelligence and good taste of the country are united in support of the proposition that politics should be excluded from the judiciary, and the judicial department of the Government kept free from the control and influence of political parties? All of us would make the same answer to this question, and yet the fact is that it is the only department of the Federal Government in which a member of the Democratic party is almost a total stranger. There is but one Democrat on the Supreme Bench, and he was a Republican when he was appointed. Every district and circuit judge in the United States, with perhaps two exceptions, is a Republican. And yet the thirty-eight States of our Union are equally divided between the two parties. The Senate and House are nearly balanced, and out of about ten millions of voters a change of twenty-five hundred either way, as shown by the last Presidential election, would give the popular majority to either of the two national parties. This absolute monopoly of the judicial power of the United States has been claimed by both parties when in power and has been permitted by the advice and consent of the Senate. The President has no more right to appoint than the Senate has to confirm. The power of each is independent and coequal.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] has announced in the Senate that the circuit judges to be appointed under the bill now pending ought to be equally divided between the two parties, and that if he were President they should be so nominated to the Senate. A leading Republican Senator has expressed the same opinion in the Senate. Then we have a right to assume, if it be of any value, that should the President, contrary to the opinion of any Republican Senators and the Senator from Illinois and the general moral sense as to what would be right and just, nominate all these judges from the Republican party, the Senator from Illinois and the Republican Senators who agree with him in opinion cannot and will not advise and consent to such nominations. Can the President expect Senators who believe that there should be an equal division of the new judges to disregard their convictions and to advise and consent as Senators to a nomination that they would not make as President? But how is it that the measure of judicial reform contained in this bill is to be prejudiced by the charge that it has a Republican origin and is designed to secure partisan benefit or advantage in its operation?

We are reliably informed that distinguished and able lawyers and statesmen, without distinction as to party, approve the bill before the Senate. It has been unanimously indorsed by the bar association of Saint Louis, and during this debate the bill has been unanimously indorsed by the bar association of New York. It is also approved in substance by General Lawton, a member of the American Bar Association, and one of the ablest lawyers and most incorruptible Democratic statesmen in Georgia, and after great deliberation it was reported by every member present of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. It has been supported in this debate by two unanswerable arguments of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] acknowledged to be one of the most clear-headed, able, and experienced lawyers and Democratic statesmen in this body, and the bill will receive the support of other Democratic Senators who are as true to their party as those who oppose this bill.

But, Mr. President, as Senators we must act on the theory, if it be not a fact, that some people besides ourselves are worthy of trust and confidence. The entire superstructure of our Government rests on trust and confidence. Our experiment of free representative government may be abandoned as an established failure if distrust is to take the place of trust and confidence in discharging the duties and responsibilities of citizenship and representation in civil government. Distrust is the fruitful source of all the trouble between the sections. Let us do our duty as becomes Senators, and trust that the President will discharge his duty as becomes his high office, and in any event we must all go before the people for accountability.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] offer his amendment now?

Mr. JONAS. I desire to offer again in the Senate the amendment which I offered in Committee of the Whole a few days ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on concurring in the amendments agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, but the Chair will entertain the motion of the Senator from Louisiana to offer at this time the amendment he proposes.

Mr. JONAS. I offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Illinois have the amendment read now?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. No; the Senate is familiar with it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] one question, which he said he would answer after he got through.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There is such a short time remaining, and my friend from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] and others wish to address the Senate, that I would rather not yield. If it is a single question and will require no time, of course I have no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. My question relates to the jurisdiction of the district courts. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama if it is not the case that under the law as it now stands suit may be instituted under the civil rights bill in the district courts for any amount, and if the judgment is under $500 no appeal can be taken in a case of that kind under this bill?

Mr. PUGH. I have not examined the statutes in reference to that jurisdiction. We have no such suits in our districts that I know of.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I trust that the pending amendment will not be adopted. In its original shape it was offered in the Committee of the Whole by the honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] as a substitute for the original bill. As remarked by my colleague on the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. GARLAND,] "it looks to defining and withdrawing jurisdiction," and the Senator himself opened his speech by declaring that "it is for the purpose of diminishing the jurisdiction of the circuit courts and necessarily of the Supreme Court in case of appeal." Although now offered as additional sections to the bill, it can hardly be said to be germane. The bill establishes an intermediate court of appeals, and does not curtail nor enlarge the original jurisdiction which is conferred by existing laws upon the circuit courts. It provides for additional judges in each circuit, and authorizes each of them appointed therefor to hold a separate session of the court therein. Whatever legislation is deemed proper concerning the controverted questions relative to the jurisdiction of the circuit court should, I submit, be provided for in a separate bill, and not be ingrafted upon one for the establishment of an appellate court.

Both Senators refer to the act of March 3, 1875, as one which greatly increased the number of cases upon commercial paper which might be brought by the assignee in the circuit court of the United States, and I was astonished to hear the Senator from Louisiana declare that "the result has been that the holder of the note, if unable to sue in a United States court, has put it in the hands of somebody who could sue in that court, and the question of the right or title of the holder is not permitted to be inquired into."

The act of September 24, 1789, which is commonly known as the judiciary act, provides that the courts of the United States shall not "have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favor of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made, except in cases of foreign bills of exchange." It was decided more than fifty years ago, in Buckner vs. Finley, 2 Peters, 586, that a bill of exchange drawn in one State of the Union upon a person in another State, and payable in the latter State, is a foreign bill within the meaning of this provision, and if by reason of citizenship the holder is competent to sue the defendant in the circuit court, his right to do so was not defeated by the fact that the original payee and the drawer were citizens of the same State. That suit was on a bill drawn at Baltimore by citizens thereof upon a party in New Orleans, in favor of a citizen of Baltimore, and by the latter indorsed to the plaintiff, a citizen of New York. The act of 1875, of which the Senator complains, extended the exception "to promissory notes negotiable by the law-merchant and bills of exchange," but he has entirely overlooked the fifth section. It expressly declares, "that if in any suit commenced in a circuit court, or removed from a State court to a circuit court of the United States, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said circuit court, at any time after such suit has been brought or removed, that such suit does not really and substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of said circuit court, or that the parties to said suit have been improperly or collusively made or joined, either as plaintiffs or defendants, for the purpose of creating a case cognizable or removable under this act, the said circuit court shall proceed no further therein, but shall dismiss the suit or remand it to the court from which it was removed, as justice may require, and shall make such order as to costs as shall be just."

This provision is unmistakably clear, as well as peremptory, in its terms. It absolutely forbids the circuit court to proceed. So far, therefore, from suppressing all inquiry as to the real title of the holder of a promissory note who has brought suit thereon, the act not only allows such inquiry, but enjoins upon the court the duty of dismissing the suit where a collusive or simulated transfer of the promissory note sued on has been made. This subject has been passed upon by the Supreme Court in the unreported case of Williams vs. The Township of Nottawa, decided at the present term. Williams was a citizen of Indiana. The township was a municipal corporation of Michigan, and he sued it in the circuit court upon certain bonds which it had issued. He was the actual owner of but three of them, each for $100, and one Tobey owned an equal number of bonds of the like denomination. Two other parties, citizens of Michigan, holding other of the bonds, transferred them to Williams solely for the purpose of collection. The citizenship of Tobey was not disclosed by the record. The trial court directed the jury to find for Williams for the amount of the six bonds, and in favor of the township for the residue. Williams removed the case to the Supreme Court. The opinion was delivered by the Chief-Justice. He remarked that the parties who resided in Michigan had, for the purpose of creating a case for themselves cognizable in a Federal court, transferred their bonds to Williams, and that neither the latter nor Tobey could sue alone in such a court, as the amount they respectively held was not sufficient. The learned Chief-Justice concluded by holding that it was the duty of the court below on its own motion to dismiss the suit as soon as its collusive character was disclosed. The judgment below was therefore reversed at the cost of the plaintiff in error, with instructions to dismiss the suit.

Under the act of 1789, it was at one time held that the question of jurisdiction could be raised only by plea in abatement. Such was the ruling in Smith vs. Kernochen, 7 Howard, 198. It was somewhat modified in Barney vs. Baltimore, 6 Wallace, 280, but the Chief-Justice remarks that whatever may have been the practice under that act, there can be no doubt what it should be under the act of 1875. A transfer for such purpose being, as he declares, a fraud upon the courts, it is their imperative duty to exercise the power conferred by the act and to dismiss such a case.

It thus appears, Mr. President, that the very act which the honorable Senator denounces as the source of unnumbered woes to debtors by subjecting them to suit in the Federal courts upon the pretended or colorable transfers of their obligations contains a stringent provision which never before existed, and requires the court on its own motion to dismiss the suit whenever such a fraud upon its jurisdiction is shown to exist.

What remedy does the honorable Senator propose for the mischiefs which he claims exist? The repeal not only of the obnoxious provision of 1875, but of so much of the time-honored act of 1789 as confers on an assignee of a foreign bill the right to sue thereon in a court of the United States, although the payee and the drawer were citizens of the same State. I cannot believe, Mr. President, that this body will, without referring the subject to the appropriate committee, abridge a jurisdiction which has been exercised by the Federal courts from their organization.

The Senator complains of the existing jurisdictional limit to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. He says that where in the circuit court a suit is brought upon a promissory note the defendant, if judgment be rendered against him, cannot prosecute a writ of error unless the amount exceeds $5,000; whereas if suit had been brought in a court of Louisiana the defendant might have appealed to the supreme court of the State if the amount involved exceeded $1,000. He says "this gross injustice is of constant occurrence, and it is the fruit of the law which I desire to amend." The bill now before the Senate is more liberal to litigating parties than the law of Louisiana. Either party may resort to the court of appeals if the sum or value is over $500. If, therefore, injustice is suffered by the action of the Federal courts in that part of the country, which the Senator so ably represents on this floor, his aggrieved constituents will, by the passage of this bill, be relieved more effectually than by the adoption of his amendment.

The next provision of the Senator's amendment looks to the repeal of the act of March 2, 1867, amendatory of the act of July 27, 1866, for the removal of causes from the State courts on this subject. I do not maintain that the several acts for the removal of causes from the State courts to the courts of the United States do not require revision and amendment. Their subject-matter, conformably to our settled practice, should be referred to the Judiciary Committee, where it will receive the attention it so well merits, and the result of their labors will be reported to this body. I am utterly opposed, however, to precipitate legislation on a subject of such vital importance as the jurisdiction of the inferior courts of the United States.

The amendment of the honorable Senator, as originally introduced, further provides for the repeal, in one essential particular, of section 14 of the judiciary act of 1789, which applies to all the courts of the United States. His repealing section is "that the circuit courts of the United States shall have the power to issue writs of mandamus to Federal officers to compel the performance of duties prescribed by law, but shall have no original jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus in any other cases whatsoever."

He complains that a court of the United States issued some years ago a mandamus against the board of commissioners of Knox County, Indiana, who refused to perform a plain ministerial duty prescribed by a law which authorized them to subscribe for stock in a railroad company, should a majority of the qualified electors vote in favor thereof, and in the event of such subscription, to issue bonds and levy an annual tax to meet the accruing interest thereon. A suit was brought upon the overdue coupons, and judgment recovered. The holder of them requested the board to perform their duty by levying the tax sufficient to realize the amount so due. They refused to do so.

The fourteenth section of the judiciary act of 1789 enacts "that courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and all other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the principles of the common law."

The circuit court, on the refusal of the board of commissioners to levy the required tax, had, as necessary to carry its judgment into effect, jurisdiction under that section to issue the mandamus. That holding was affirmed by the unanimous judgment of the Supreme Court, in Board of Commissioners vs. Aspinwall, 21 Howard, 376. That court was, in addition to the eminent judge who pronounced its opinion, composed of Mr. Chief-Justice Taney, Mr. Justice Campbell, Mr. Justice Nelson, Mr. Justice Clifford, and others whose learning, soundness of judgment, and purity of life would confer distinction upon any tribunal. With one exception they have all passed away.

The court has in several subsequent cases adhered to the doctrine that a mandamus is in the nature of an execution to carry the judgment into effect, and it will be issued where without it the creditor cannot secure the satisfaction of his judgment. While, however, the writ will, by the laws of some of the States, lie at the instance of a holder of unpaid coupons, whether they are reduced to judgment or not, to compel the assessment and levy, and the State court will award him the writ, as in the case of Shinbone vs. Randolph County, 56 Alabama, 183, the rule is different in the courts of the United States. In them a judgment must be obtained, and the writ will then only lie to render that judgment effectual. The Senator says that the case referred to was the first in which it was judicially asserted that a power existed in the courts of the United States to issue the writ in furtherance of their judgments. It was the first time that the question arose. The Senate is aware of the altered condition of the country in reference to the railroad and other enterprises of the day. Municipal corporations have besought the Legislatures of their respective States, especially in the West and in some portions of the South, to vest them with power to subscribe for stock in the companies organized to carry the enterprises into effect. That power was conferred subject to a popular vote in favor of its exercise. That vote was generally cast. The people expected to reap a golden harvest. Enhanced value was to be given to their lands. Greater facilities for reaching market were to be furnished. The stock was accordingly subscribed. Bonds were issued in payment therefor, and in many instances there was an express stipulation that a special tax should be annually levied to pay interest and to provide a fund for the ultimate payment of the principal. The road was built. The anticipated benefits were not always realized.

Popular clamor against the stipulated exercise of the taxing power was excited, and although such exercise formed an essential part of the contracts, the officers intrusted with the power refused to execute it, or it was at the instance of those upon whom it operated withdrawn by legislative enactment. The holders of the securities, who purchased them in good faith, were without a remedy unless the courts were vested with jurisdiction to compel the performance of the contract. In my earlier days I never knew an instance where municipal corporations granted aid to railroad or turnpike companies or subscribed for their stock. They did not incur debts except to a most limited extent, and then only for such purposes as the erection of school-houses, court-houses, and jails. A new spirit came over the American people. Townships, cities, and counties became indebted by the expressed consent of the people who were to bear the burdens. It may meet the views of a city or other municipality that laws passed after the indebtedness has been incurred should forbid the issue of an execution or other coercive process upon a judgment against it, or withdraw or so restrict the taxing power as to prevent the raising of means to meet contracts which were made upon a pledge that the power should be exercised for their fulfillment. The municipality has, however, had the benefit which these contracts conferred, and should not be suffered to repudiate or to evade the obligation which they enjoin. The Supreme Court has, therefore, decided that notwithstanding such laws a mandamus will lie to compel the exercise of that power in favor of a creditor who has recovered judgment on such a contract, and who has no other adequate remedy to enforce it. That court has gone no further. In view of these decisions, however, the Senator proposes to strip the courts of the United States of a power with which they have been invested since their organization, and to declare, by positive enactment, that in the exercise of their original jurisdiction they shall not issue that writ to any but an officer of the United States. This is a most sweeping change in existing laws. I know of no proposition submitted to either House of Congress which affects to so great a degree the jurisdiction of those courts unless it be the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

That amendment has been accepted by the Senator from Louisiana as a substitute for the third section of his amendment. By its terms "no city, town, village, county, or other municipal or public corporation shall be sued in the courts of the United States." A citizen of a State, while he may sue a citizen of another State in the proper circuit court if the matter in controversy between them be of the value of $500, would by the contemplated amendment be absolutely excluded from that court if his cause of action, whether ex contractu or ex delicto, be against the municipality. If, for example, he is the creditor of a county or it has wrongfully appropriated his property, he would be compelled to prosecute his suit in the courts of the State, sitting perhaps in that county, and he could not remove it into the circuit court. The Senator from Arkansas has with some severity and with his accustomed ability commented upon the doctrine in Louisville Railroad Company vs. Letson, 2 Howard, 497, where the Supreme Court at its January term, 1844, unanimously decided that for all purposes of suing and of being sued a corporation created by and doing business in a State is capable of being treated as a citizen. He insisted that the doctrine, although followed in every subsequent case, is in conflict with the earlier rulings of that court when Marshall was at its head. Bank of the United States vs. Deveaux, 5 Cranch, 61, to which he referred in support of his position, decides that a corporation aggregate composed of citizens of one State may sue a citizen of another State in the circuit court. It may therefore be sued by him. Now, the organized subdivisions of a State, whether they consist of cities, counties, or townships, are composed exclusively of its citizens. No just reason can be assigned why, if liable to suit in the local courts, they should not be subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal courts as fully and effectually as is the individual citizen. The great chief-justice who gave the opinion of the court in that leading case, remarks:

> However true the fact may be that the tribunal of the States will administer justice as impartially as those of the nation, to parties of every description, it is not less true that the Constitution itself either entertains apprehension on this subject or views with such indulgence the possible fears and apprehensions of suitors that it has established national tribunals for the decision of controversies between aliens and a citizen, or between citizens of different States. Aliens or citizens of different States are not less susceptible of these apprehensions, nor can they be supposed to be less the objects of constitutional provisions because they are allowed to sue by a corporate name. The name, indeed, cannot be an alien or a citizen, but the persons whom it represents may be the one or the other; and the controversy is in fact and in law between those persons suing in their corporate character, by their corporate name, for a corporate right, and the individual against whom the suit may be instituted. Substantially and essentially the parties in such a case, where the members of the corporation are aliens or citizens of a different State, from the opposite party, come within the spirit and terms of the jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution on the national tribunals. Such has been the universal understanding on the subject. Repeatedly has this court decided causes between a corporation and an individual without feeling a doubt respecting its jurisdiction.

These observations apply with the same force whether the municipal corporations be plaintiff or defendant, and it will be perceived that the doctrine in Louisville Railroad Company, which the Senator so pointedly condemns, is in entire harmony with every decision of that court so far as such a corporation is concerned.

It is a well-known historical fact, that jurisdiction over controversies to which citizens of different States were parties was conferred upon the courts of the United States in order that they might be determined by a tribunal created by the national authority, and beyond the reach of local influence or prejudice. All fears of such influence, or prejudice, may in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred rest on no real foundation whatever. It is, however, the constitutional right of the citizen to resort to the courts of the United States in the cases contemplated by the Constitution, and Congress would be unmindful of an imperative duty if it did not afford the requisite facilities for the effectual assertion and maintenance of that right. Senators have spoken of the courts of the United States, or rather of a few judges thereof, as unworthy of public confidence, and as exercising their functions in a spirit of partisanship and oppression. These are marked exceptions to the general rule. Those judges of these courts are, in my part of the country, worthy of the exalted trust confided to them. Senators speak of Federal courts as if they were established by an alien government. The Government of the Union is our government. Those to whom its judicial power is committed are as much bound to maintain the rights of the people of each State, and of the State itself, as are those appointed by the State to interpret and administer its laws, and, in my opinion, they discharge their arduous duties in a manner worthy of the best days of the republic.

I have thought it my duty, Mr. President, to say this much in regard to the action of the Federal courts, in awarding the writ of mandamus, and to the decisions of the Supreme Court, where municipal corporations are concerned.

Notwithstanding the attempted innovations upon our established jurisprudence, and the withdrawal from the Federal courts of their jurisdiction, which the amendment proposes, the Senator from Arkansas expresses the opinion that a necessity will still exist for the creation of an intermediate court of appeals. Why, then, clog this bill with amendments having no relation to that court? I will cheerfully co-operate with him in making all changes in our judicial system which time has shown to be expedient. The subject, however, is one confessedly of vital importance, and it should be examined in committee with all the care which that importance demands. But I am inflexibly opposed to embarrassing this bill with such inopportune amendments, and I believe that, if adopted, they will insure its defeat. I trust, therefore, that every Senator who favors this bill, and who is of opinion that such an appellate court as it provides for should be established, will vote against the proposed and all similar amendments.

Mr. LAPHAM. I have no purpose, Mr. President, to prolong the discussion upon this bill. I only desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few moments while I state the reasons which will govern me in the vote which I shall give upon the measure.

During the session of the Forty-fifth Congress I had the honor of introducing in the other House a bill quite similar in its provisions to the one now under consideration. It differed only in some of its details. It provided, in the main, for a court of review such as is provided for in this bill. I never could secure favorable action from the Judiciary Committee of the House upon the subject, for the reasons which have been urged by gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber against the passage of this bill. The necessity for some relief in civil actions has long been felt by the judiciary and by those who take part in the trial and in the argument of causes, and if this bill related to civil actions only it should receive my hearty support.

Objection has been made to the bill by reason of the fact that the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States under its provisions is limited to cases involving the sum of $10,000, or upward, whereas it is at present limited to cases involving the sum of $5,000, and I believe originally in the judiciary act the limit was only $2,000. Senators who make this objection, it seems to me, fail to reflect upon the changed condition of the times. Ten thousand dollars now will not exclude from the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as large a proportion of causes as $5,000 did when that provision was enacted, or as $2,000 did at the time the judiciary act was framed. A larger proportion of the causes tried in the Federal courts will, under the bill we are now considering, be liable to be taken to the Supreme Court with the limitation fixed at $10,000 than formerly came to the same court under the lesser limitation, which was established by law.

I well remember in the discussions which took place here during the struggle by President Jackson and his supporters against the recharter of the Bank of the United States, it was claimed that that institution in a period of six months had extended its circulation $30,000,000, and thus created an artificial prosperity in the country, and then in six months more it had curtailed its circulation a like amount, and brought distress and bankruptcy upon the people. An extension of the circulation to $300,000,000 now would not create the stimulus in business that $30,000,000 did then, or a curtailment of $300,000,000 now would not work the distress which $30,000,000 did then. It is just so with this provision in regard to the limitation of appeals to the highest tribunal in the country. The amount named in the bill seems large at first sight, but when the magnitude of litigations now is compared with the amounts in controversy at earlier periods, the increase of the limitation is no greater than is warranted by the changed condition of affairs.

This mode of procedure under the Federal judiciary has gone on until the calendar of the Supreme Court is known to be entirely beyond the possibility of being disposed of by one court. Some kind of relief must be had. We found it necessary in the State of New York to get relief of the same character, and by a constitutional provision a commission of appeals was provided for, who were to take all the cases assigned to them by the court itself from the general calendar, and in that manner all the old business was disposed of, so that the present court of appeals started with a new calendar, but that cannot be done under the Constitution of the United States. That declares that there shall be but one Supreme Court, and therefore, without an amendment to the Constitution, the only mode in which relief can be given to the Supreme Court here is to stop the appeals which come here under the limited sum which is now provided by making a larger sum necessary in order to entitle the party to appeal, and thus relieve the calendar of the court. This the Congress has power to do. It may create judicial tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court. I repeat that if this bill related solely to the remedies in civil actions I should support the bill, and support it cheerfully.

But the crowning measure of this bill, in my estimation, is found in the fact that for the first time in our history we are now to be provided with a right of review in criminal cases. It is true under the law as it now is, upon a certificate of division in the circuit court, a criminal case may reach the Supreme Court here, but only in that mode. It is true that in 1879 a bill originated in the House of Representatives, and I took part in procuring the passage of that bill, which provides for a review in a limited class of cases brought from the district to the circuit court by writ of error. But that is limited to criminal cases in the district court where there is a sentence of imprisonment, or fine and imprisonment, and if a fine only, the fine shall exceed the sum of $300. It applies solely and only to the case of a trial in the district courts of the United States. A review in criminal cases tried in the circuit court, which has concurrent jurisdiction with the district court in nearly all criminal cases, can never be had anywhere except on a certificate of division between the judges. It is amazing to me that for almost a hundred years we have been going on trying rights of property, and carrying cases from court to court, and to the supreme tribunal here, while if a man was to be tried for his life or his liberty, he has had, practically, no right of review whatever, but has been compelled to abide by whatever decisions have been made in the haste of a trial at nisi prius.

Take the case of a man indicted for a capital offense. He cannot be tried in the district court. The statute provides that, if the indictment is found in the district court, it shall be removed to the circuit court for trial. He is tried in a circuit court, and that is the end of the litigation so far as the accused is concerned, unless there happen to be two judges present, and they divide in opinion as to questions which arise during the trial, and then only the questions upon which they divide can be taken to the Supreme Court for its consideration.

Upon all questions in respect to which the judges agree, however obnoxious to justice, however violative of the rights of the accused, those questions cannot come here for the purposes of review. Now this bill, in its eighth section, provides for a review by the court of appeals in all criminal cases, whether tried in the district or in the circuit court. It gives, practically, what is secured to a person accused of crime in the State I have the honor in part to represent. In that State a writ of error in a criminal case is a writ of right. Every human being accused of crime has a right to review upon a writ of error. No officer can deny it; there is no power to prevent it. The design of the eighth section of this bill is to secure substantially that right to persons accused of crime in the Federal courts. Whether a man be tried for his life or for his liberty, or whether he be subjected simply to the imposition of a fine, if it is a criminal case, he is to have a right under this bill, if it becomes a law, to a review in this court of appeals.

It is time, I submit, Mr. President, that we should stop to consider whether it is of more consequence to try rights of property than it is to try the right to life and liberty. It is time that every Senator on this floor who regards the life and liberty of the citizen as more sacred than the right of property should consider whether he ought not to give his vote for this provision which shall secure this right to the citizen. This provision of the bill, I repeat, is the crowning feature which gives it its chief value, in my estimation, and one for which, if there were no other reason, it should receive my cordial and hearty support.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS.) The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole? Shall the question be taken on the amendments in gross or separately? If there be no objection, the question will be taken on the amendments in gross.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understood the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] made some exceptions, but I am told by my friends that that makes no difference; he can do what he wishes to do after this vote is taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to taking the vote on the amendments in gross? The Chair hears none. The question will be put on all the amendments in gross.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to submit a report from a conference committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received and read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3208) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2 and agree to the same.

H. L. DAWES,
JAS. B. BECK,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
WM. H. FORNEY,
J. H. KETCHAM,
THOS. RYAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to have the Senator in charge state what change has been made. We do not know by the mere reading of the numbers of the amendments.

Mr. DAWES. There were three amendments of the Senate. One was a verbal one, in which the House concurred at once. One was an amendment striking out a few words which rendered it possible for the Ordnance Department to turn smooth-bore cannon into rifled cannon. That one the conference committee have agreed for the Senate to recede from, leaving the bill as it came from the House in that regard. The other was an appropriation of $5,000 to enable the Ordnance Department to loan two guns of heavy artillery to the militia of different States for the purpose of practice. That is agreed to by the House. That is all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Is that a general provision, or is it confined to a special State?

Mr. DAWES. It is general.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I understand that the only increase in the bill——

Mr. DAWES. There is no increase in the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. How do you get the $5,000?

Mr. DAWES. That was put on in the Senate by an amendment of the Senate.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4466) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. JONAS.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I renew the amendment found in the printed bill on page 10, being the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary which was lost in Committee of the Whole by a tie vote. I move to strike out from line 25 to and including the word "court" in line 32, and to insert the proviso there printed in italics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the amendment be read? If it is not the pleasure of the Senate to insist on that, the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Probably Senators do not know what this amendment is. It is the patent question, which was debated in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. All Senators will know it when it is read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In section 10, line 25, after the word "opinion," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "court" in line 32, as follows:

And in patent and copyright cases in equity a review by the Supreme Court may be had, without regard to the sum or value in dispute, upon the questions both of law and fact affecting the validity or the infringement of the patent or the copyright: Provided, That the court of appeals shall certify that a question is involved of sufficient importance to render it proper that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Provided, That in all cases in which by existing laws the Supreme Court may now exercise appellate jurisdiction without regard to the sum in controversy, except in cases touching patent rights and copyrights, the Supreme Court shall continue to have and exercise such jurisdiction in the manner now provided by law.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire if any Senator has a general pair with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. GARLAND. I am paired with him expressly.

Mr. HOAR. On this amendment?

Mr. GARLAND. On this very amendment and several others.

Mr. HOAR. Are you with the committee or against the committee on this amendment?

Mr. GARLAND. I am for the committee against the bill as it originally was in this respect, and the Senator from Vermont is with the committee.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Vermont asked me the other day to pair with him on this matter alone. I have not seen him since, and I was not sure that his pair continued.

Mr. GARLAND. I can transfer the pair to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. No; leave the pair as it is. If the Senator from Arkansas is paired with the Senator from Vermont on this amendment that answers the purpose.

Mr. PLATT. I was out of the Senate when the amendment was offered, and I am not sure that I understand what it is. I suppose, however, it is the one which the Senate failed to agree to relating to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court with regard to patent and copyright causes. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CALL. I should like to hear the question stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. What is that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report it once again.

Mr. ALLISON. It is the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, but voted down in Committee of the Whole by a tie vote.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It is the amendment of the Judiciary Committee in reference to patent-right and copyright cases. That was lost by a tie vote, and therefore the bill stands as it was introduced originally in that respect. The Senator from Iowa now moves to insert the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLATT. It may as well be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the amendment of Mr. ALLISON.

Mr. BAYARD. This amendment was the subject of discussion when the bill was in Committee of the Whole, and I found that some of my friends near me did not concur with me in their interpretation of the words printed in italics. I am very clear upon full consideration as to what the words from line 25 to 32, proposed to be canceled in the print, mean and what they effect. They are:

And in patent and copyright cases in equity a review by the Supreme Court may be had, without regard to the sum or value in dispute, upon the questions both of law and fact affecting the validity or the infringement of the patent or the copyright: Provided, That the court of appeals shall certify that a question is involved of sufficient importance to render it proper that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court.

I think there can be no doubt as to what the effect of that language is, that unless such a suit shall involve the sum of $10,000, or unless there shall be a certificate from the appellate court that it involves a question which ought to be decided by the Supreme Court a patent or a copyright case shall stand exactly as other cases before the courts. Then in lieu of those come the words printed in italics:

Provided, That in all cases in which by existing laws the Supreme Court may now exercise appellate jurisdiction without regard to the sum in controversy, except in cases touching patent-rights and copyrights, the Supreme Court shall continue to have and exercise such jurisdiction in the manner now provided by law.

The effect of this bill is to change jurisdiction. The great feature of this bill is to interpose a kind of legal sieve between the circuit and district courts of the United States and the Supreme Court, which is to catch, so to speak, all the cases involving less than $10,000 in amount, and subject them to the final decision of this interappellate court, beyond which they cannot go unless they are to be certified as to their importance in the manner set forth in the bill. There is no reason why the same finality should not be reached, and in the same way, in regard to patent and copyright cases as others. I am not disposed at all to vote for this language in italics which shall discriminate against patent and copyright cases and shall prevent them from going to the Supreme Court of the United States. I say if, first, they involve the proper amount as other cases, and next if they do not involve a large amount, but do include a matter of grave importance, they ought to come for their decision, probably more than almost any other cases, to the Supreme Court of the United States. I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to the preceding portion of section 10 which provides for the appeal from this interappellate court to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. Shall I disturb the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. BAYARD. No.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Senator to be in favor of placing patent-rights and copyrights upon precisely the same plane as other cases in the Supreme Court.

Mr. BAYARD. I am.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I understand, if that is to be done, the amendment I propose, printed in italics in the bill before us, is absolutely necessary; otherwise patent-right and copyright cases, without reference to the amount involved, may go directly to the Supreme Court from the court of appeals.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator be pleased to tell me, then, the meaning of the words from line 29 to line 32? What is the meaning of that proviso? Read it aloud, please.

Mr. ALLISON. "Provided, That the court of appeals shall certify that a question is involved of sufficient importance to render it proper that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court."

Mr. BAYARD. Very well, unless you get that, in addition to the sum of $10,000 involved, the case cannot go up.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the proviso which I have just read to mean, taken as a whole, that in all cases——

Mr. BAYARD. Of less than $10,000.

Mr. ALLISON. No. The words I propose to strike out are:

And in patent and copyright cases in equity a review by the Supreme Court may be had, without regard to the sum or value in dispute, upon the questions both of law and fact affecting the validity or the infringement of the patent or the copyright: Provided, That——

Mr. BAYARD. The proviso applies to that clause. I think the meaning of that is very clear, that such cases go up sub conditione; they go up provided the certificate from below goes with them.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; but why not allow patent-rights and copyright cases to rest precisely on the conditions and limitations named on page 9 which affect all other cases?

Mr. BAYARD. That is a question of redrafting the entire section. I think myself that section 10 could be very much improved by one or two amendments. I am compelled to believe that while the attempt to limit the jurisdiction by amounts only may be wise practically in most cases, it is wholly unscientific and wholly unphilosophic. The gravest and the greatest questions affecting human affairs have often attached themselves to the most insignificant sums and the most apparently insignificant disputes. Therefore it is very necessary that while for the practical purposes of business you are to interpose a sieve to catch the smaller cases and throw them back from your court of last resort, you should at least give to the courts below the right to send important questions up that they may receive the final decision of the court of ultimate resort of the country, in order not only to quiet litigation but to do it upon the basis of assured justice, that it shall not only settle dispute but satisfy the conscience of litigants. That is the great end, not simply to dispose of a case but to dispose of it upon the principles of eternal justice as far as human machinery may bring it about.

My criticism of this section 10 is that, granting the fact that you are to allow no man with less than $10,000 in controversy to go to the Supreme Court, still you ought to leave the door open for the conscience of the courts below to serve to the Supreme Court any case that involves an important question.

Mr. INGALLS. A question of law, the Senator means.

Mr. BAYARD. Of course a question of law, a principle, although there may be a question of fact which in itself involves a question of law. You cannot undertake to sever or discriminate by verbal description the cases which may present important questions.

In section 10—I draw the attention of the honorable Senator who has this bill in charge—it is provided:

But a review upon the law may be had upon writ of error or appeal in the manner now provided by law to the Supreme Court of the United States from every final judgment or decree of the court of appeals, where the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of $10,000, exclusive of costs, or where the adjudication involves a question upon the construction of the Constitution or the construction or the validity of a treaty or a law of the United States, or where the court shall certify that the adjudication involves a legal question of sufficient importance to require that the final decision thereof should be made by the Supreme Court.

Mr. INGALLS. Does that not include cases concerning patents and copyrights?

Mr. BAYARD. I want it to. I do not think the language which is stricken from the bill by this amendment would be inconsistent with that. That is the reason why I want the canceled part to stand, and why I am not sure that the part in italics should be inserted. The section proceeds:

But in the two last-mentioned cases the court of appeals shall state the specific question arising upon the construction of the Constitution, or the construction or the validity of such treaty or law, or the specific legal question that the adjudication involves.

I would suggest to the honorable Senator who has the bill in charge that in line 17 he should strike out the word "specific," and on line 19 strike out the words "specific legal." It is quite enough to apply to this question of appeal the same language that has been applied so long in our courts. I understand these amendments are not objected to, and the Senator in charge of the bill approves of the motion to strike out on lines 17 and 19 of section 10 what I have suggested.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. We had better take a vote.

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly. I move to strike out, in line 17 of section 10, the word "specific," before "question," and in line 19, the words "specific legal," before "question."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is that a motion to amend the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, or the part to be stricken out?

Mr. ALLISON. That is on page 9, which has no relation to my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that be waived for the moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This amendment is waived. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. On line 17 of section 10 it is proposed to strike out the word "specific," and on line 19 to strike out the words "specific legal;" so as to make the clause read:

But in the two last-mentioned cases the court of appeals shall state the question arising upon the construction of the Constitution, or the construction or the validity of such treaty or law, or the question that the adjudication involves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on this amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I desire, if I can, to give the Senate a clear understanding of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, as the law now stands, in relation to patent and copyright cases, the jurisdiction which the Supreme Court will have if the bill passes as it was introduced, and the effect of this amendment, for it seems to me that possibly there has been some little confusion in relation to that matter.

The Supreme Court of the United States now has jurisdiction of all questions of law which arise in patent cases which have been tried as actions at law. Where there is a verdict of a jury in those cases the Supreme Court now has jurisdiction only of the questions of law which arise in patent and copyright cases; but where the action has been an equity proceeding, as nine-tenths and, I think, more of all patent causes are in equity, there the Supreme Court to-day, without regard to the amount involved, has jurisdiction both of questions of law and of fact.

Now, this bill as drawn would take away from the Supreme Court jurisdiction in all cases where the amount involved was less than $10,000 in actions at law, unless the question was certified by the court below. It would also take away from the Supreme Court all jurisdiction in questions of fact arising in equity cases, unless the cause was certified from the court below as being of sufficient importance.

It will be observed that in both these respects the bill as it was introduced is a very great restriction upon the present jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in patent and copyright cases, and now by the amendment it is proposed to take away jurisdiction in all questions of fact and in all questions of law where the amount involved is not $10,000, unless in those very few cases which are tried as actions at law where the specific legal question shall be certified to the Supreme Court. It seems to me that this bill as it was introduced goes far enough. It will practically divest the Supreme Court of nine-tenths of its present jurisdiction in patent and copyright cases without the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator think the amendment in italics will help that, or hurt it?

Mr. PLATT. That would take it all away; but leaving the bill as it was introduced without the amendment, it will practically deprive the Supreme Court of nine-tenths of its present jurisdiction in patent and copyright cases.

Mr. BAYARD. It puts patent and copyright cases on the same basis as other cases.

Mr. PLATT. Substantially. It seems to me that is going far enough. I do not wish to reargue this matter, but it is manifest that there are questions of fact arising in patent and copyright cases that ought to go to the Supreme Court of the United States, and I think I can show it. I want to get for a moment outside of patents, and so I will take my illustration from copyright cases.

Mr. Schouler, of Boston, I believe has commenced to write and to publish a history of the United States starting from where Mr. Bancroft leaves that history. He is a legal writer and a writer of distinction. If he succeeds, he will have made for himself both fame and money, and his copyright will be worth vastly more than $10,000 to him. Now, let us see how this bill with the amendment will affect him. Possibly another person seeing that he has a valuable property in his copyright, proposes to imitate it just enough not to come within the copyright law, and at the same time get the benefit of his fame and reputation, and so he publishes a book in Chicago which he thinks does not infringe the copyright law, and yet which, if he can be permitted to scatter it broadcast over this land, will entirely destroy the property which Mr. Schouler would otherwise have in his book.

Mr. Schouler brings an action in equity against him in Boston in the circuit court there. It is decided that it is an infringement of his copyright; but it is a question of fact, a pure question of fact. It is decided there in an equity proceeding that it is an infringement of the copyright; but the man goes on in Chicago infringing, and Mr. Schouler goes out to Chicago and brings his action there, and there it is decided that it is not an infringement, and the case goes to the court of appeals, and the court of appeals holds in the Boston circuit that it is an infringement and holds in the Chicago circuit that it is not an infringement, and there it is. The value of that copyright to Mr. Schouler under those circumstances is as effectually destroyed as if the same decision had been rendered in every circuit in the United States.

Now, I say that in a matter of that importance Mr. Schouler, to carry out the illustration, ought to have the poor privilege, if a court thinks that it is a question of sufficient importance, to go to the Supreme Court of the United States, to have it certified there, which he would have under the bill if this amendment does not prevail; but if it does prevail that will be taken away from him entirely.

Mr. BAYARD. He would have it under the language which is proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. PLATT. Just so with patent-rights. We may as well talk frankly about these things. The result, the effect of this amendment is to destroy the value of the property in all important patent-rights, and it is understood so throughout the country. The whole value of a patent-right lies in its legal protection. If it can be infringed in one part of the country by reason of a decision of the circuit court in that part of the country that it is not an infringement, a decision in one circuit to that effect is just as destructive or nearly as destructive of the value of the property as such a decision in all the circuits would be. Now, it will not be denied—no one needs to be a prophet to see—that in these important patent-right cases there will be conflicting decisions in the different circuits and in the courts of appeals in the different circuits, and wherever that takes place the value of the patent-right involved will be mainly if not entirely destroyed. Now, I say that these two kinds of property are of such a character that there ought to be the poor privilege in a case where a court thinks that the question should be certified to the Supreme Court of the United States for settlement of having it done.

If I have made this matter clear I have accomplished all that I intended or could expect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Is the amendment to strike out and insert?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To strike out and insert.

Mr. HOAR. I move to strike out from the matter proposed to be inserted the words "except in cases touching patent-rights and copyrights," in the thirty-sixth line of the section.

Mr. ALLISON. That simply nullifies the amendment, so that the whole proviso might as well be struck out.

Mr. HOAR. That leaves the law in regard to patent and copyrights where it is now.

Mr. ALLISON. That leaves it worse than the original bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. A great deal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HOAR. I will let the question be taken on the other first.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I would beg the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir; I withdraw that amendment and will take the question on the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON]

Mr. BAYARD. That amendment, although the Chair speaks of it as the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, is the same amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. It is the amendment of the Judiciary Committee, not mine.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It is precisely the amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee and rejected in Committee of the Whole by a tie vote.

The Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) As stated awhile ago, I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. GEORGE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GORMAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH.]

Mr. JONAS, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this amendment, and all amendments, with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.]

Mr. MILLER, of New York, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.]

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GEORGE. I discover that my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] expired yesterday evening, and he has another pair to-day. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I drew this bill, and naturally would have been in favor of the provision as it was inserted in the original bill, but the committee altered it, and I reported the bill, and in obedience to that duty I record my vote "yea."

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I ascertain from the RECORD that the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME,] with whom I am paired, voted before in the same way as I would vote myself on this question. Therefore I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Allison,	Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,
Beck,	Davis of Illinois,	Ingalls,	Maxey,
Cameron of Wis.,	Farley,	Jackson,	Plumb,
Chilcott,	George,	Johnston,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Jones of Florida,	Vest,
Coke,	Harrison.	McDill,	Voorhees.

NAYS—27.

Bayard,	Frye,	Miller of Cal.,	Rollins,
Blair,	Grover,	Miller of N. Y.,	Sawyer,
Butler,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Sherman,
Call,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Lapham,	Platt,	Windom.
Dawes,	McPherson,	Pugh,

ABSENT—25.

Aldrich,	Garland,	Kellogg,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Gorman,	Lamar,	Sewell,
Brown,	Groome,	Logan,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	Hale,	Mahone,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Hill of Georgia,	Mitchell,
Fair,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Ferry,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. In section 6, line 58, the word "the" should be omitted. It reads "subject to the provisions of the this section." The word "the" should be omitted to make good sense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to that amendment, and it will be made.

Mr. VANCE. In section 9, line 5, I move to strike out "Richmond" as the place for the sitting of the court of appeals in the fourth circuit, and insert "Raleigh," for this reason: the bill provides for holding these courts at Boston, New York, Philadelphia—which are respectively the business centers of their circuits—and then it skips from Philadelphia to Richmond, a distance of about three hundred miles.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow his amendment to be reported from the desk before he speaks upon it? I did not hear it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It is putting Raleigh in place of Richmond as the place for holding the appellate court in the fourth circuit.

Mr. VANCE. From Richmond to New Orleans is between twelve and fourteen hundred miles. From Raleigh to Richmond is about one hundred and fifty miles. It would be a great convenience to have this court held near the center of the fourth circuit, as Raleigh would be, rather than Richmond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. Richmond is a central point and the point where there is most business.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to ask whether West Virginia is not included in the same circuit with Virginia? Of course, then, we are further from Raleigh than from Richmond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEORGE. I rise to offer an amendment which I offered yesterday evening, and which was then voted down without any explanation. I have shown it to members of the Judiciary Committee who favor this bill, and they favor it, and I therefore offer it again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section:

SEC. 15. That any defendant in a suit at law or equity in any court of the United States may plead or except to the jurisdiction of the court at the same time that he pleads or answers to the merits; and if said plea or exception be overruled or decided against him, he shall, nevertheless, be entitled to defend on the merits as if said plea had not been filed nor said exception taken.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. By the common law, as we all know, a plea to the jurisdiction, if unsuccessful, prevents the party from pleading to the merits; and my friend from Mississippi says that that rule is still enforced in Mississippi. It is not enforced in the region of country from which I come; and although this amendment does interject something that ought not to be in a bill establishing a court, to settle a question of pleading that the appellate court should settle for itself, yet the Judiciary Committee, all of us who are here, have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to draw the attention of the Senator who has this bill in charge to something that is important in the way of detail and necessary to the successful working of this scheme.

It will be observed that there is no provision made in regard to the approval of appeal bonds. The matter I suppose is expected to be controlled by the general law now existing, and that law is that in all cases of appeal from the circuit to the Supreme Court of the United States the citation shall issue and the appeal bond shall be approved either by the judge of the circuit or by a justice of the Supreme Court. All appeals under the old system were required to be taken during the term or within ten days thereafter, so that the circuit judge was always accessible, or presumed to be accessible, in order to obtain his approval to an appeal bond to perfect an appeal. Under this bill a period of six months is given within which to take an appeal or to prosecute a writ of error, and inasmuch as the district judge is now made a part of this court, I conceive that it would be wise and proper to give to the district judge authority to approve the bond and to direct the citation, the same as the justice of the Supreme Court or the circuit judge is now authorized to do under existing law. That is the whole purpose of this amendment which I propose to offer. I desire to incorporate it after the word "reviewed," on page 5, section 6, line 15, as an additional proviso:

Provided further, That all citations, writs of error, appeal bonds, or other processes or papers which, under the existing laws of the United States are necessary to be signed or approved by a justice of the Supreme Court or a judge of the circuit court in order to make effectual an appeal from the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States, may under this act be signed or approved by the judge of the district wherein the cause is tried, or by the judge of the circuit, or the justice of the Supreme Court assigned thereto.

The whole object of this amendment is to give the district judge where an appeal is taken the power to approve the appeal bond the same as the circuit judge, who may be absent, or the justice of the Supreme Court, who is always absent, because it gives six months within which to take an appeal, and it is not to be presumed that the circuit judge can be present in every district where an appeal may be necessary to be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will send his amendment to the Secretary's desk and have it reported.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. We intended by this bill to preserve things as they are, and to leave the court of appeals to establish rules not inconsistent with the law; but I have no particular objection to the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know whether I heard the amendment correctly; but does it not in terms provide that the writ of error, among the other things enumerated, may be issued by the judge to whose decision the writ of error lies?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is done now in the circuit. It is done now in appeals from the circuit judge to the Supreme Court. He has the power.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It gives the district judge the same right that the circuit judge now has.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It is a matter of right; there is no option about it.

Mr. HOAR. I do not object to it; but the circuit judge is a judge of the higher court.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. No, no.

Mr. HOAR. I do not speak of circuit judges as at present constituted, but I speak of the enlarged circuit judges under this bill. This provision is a little incongruous as applied to a writ, but I do not care anything about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to a question of order. I want to know whether it was not the understanding yesterday that after four o'clock to-day there should be no more speech making; that we should vote upon the amendments. I ask for the enforcement of the rule. ["Right!" "Right!"] It is after four o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If there are no further amendments, let us vote on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announced distinctly yesterday that the consent of the Senate had been given to take the final vote at four o'clock to-day. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to make an inquiry. I want to know whether the lines on page 10, after the word "opinion," in line 25, down to the word "court," in line 32, are in the bill.

Mr. GARLAND. They are in the bill, as I understand, because the amendment proposing to strike them out was not agreed to. The Senate, failing to adopt the amendment, restored those words as a part of the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Then those words are in the bill now? ["Yes!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The part canceled in the printed bill on page 10 remains. The anendment proposing to strike out those lines was disagreed to, as was the proposed amendment to insert the words printed in italics disagreed to. Hence the bill stands in that respect just as it was originally presented by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GEORGE. I move to strike out, in the sixth line of section 9, the words "New Orleans," and insert "Jackson, Mississippi," as the place for holding the court of appeals in the fifth circuit.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senate goes to that, will the Senator allow me to move to reconsider the vote adopting the amendment of the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES?] I made a suggestion which I did not press, but I am quite certain the Senator from Florida will see that his amendment should be modified. I move to reconsider the vote by which it was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. If I may have unanimous consent to state in one word——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think the Senator is laboring under a misapprehension.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator from Massachusetts proceeding? ["No!" "No!"] The Senator will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. The amendment reads:

Provided further, That all citations, writs of error, appeal bonds, or other processes or papers which, under the existing laws of the United States, are necessary to be signed or approved by a justice of the Supreme Court or a judge of the circuit court in order to make effectual an appeal from the circuit to the Supreme Court, may, under this act, be signed or approved by the district judge," &c.

Now, so far as that applies to bonds or other things of that kind, it is very proper that the judge from whom the appeal goes should sign them; but I do not see how a citation to appear in the Supreme Court of the United States, which should properly be signed by a judge of that court, which issues by the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, or a writ of error is to be signed or approved by the judge of the tribunal from which the appeal is taken or to which the writ of error lies or is addressed. It seems to me that it is an impropriety to include in this enumeration "citations and writs of error." If the Senator will strike out those words, leaving it to read, "Provided further, That all appeal bonds or other processes or papers," &c., that would cover everything which the justice of the Supreme Court or the judge of the circuit court deals with in his capacity as a circuit judge. Those things which the judge of the Supreme Court of the United States does in his capacity as a member of that court and exercising its authority ought not certainly to be exercised by a judge of the district court.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If my amendment is at fault, the existing statute is at fault, because while the writ of error is usually tested in the name of the Supreme Court, it is now signed by the judge of the circuit court from whose judgment it is intended to make effectual an appeal under the existing statute; so that that same objection would apply to the existing law. Section 999 of the Revised Statutes, speaking of writs of error from the Supreme Court to the circuit court of the United States, says:

SEC. 999. When the writ is issued by the Supreme Court to a circuit court, the citation shall be signed by a judge of such circuit court, or by a justice of the Supreme Court, and the adverse party shall have at least thirty days' notice; and when it is issued by the Supreme Court to a State court, the citation shall be signed by the Chief-Justice, or judge, or chancellor of such court, rendering the judgment or passing the decree complained of, or by a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the adverse party shall have at least thirty days' notice.

The usual practice under the existing law is that, after a judgment of the circuit court of the United States which is intended to be taken up by writ of error, the citation and the writ of error may by signed by the judge of the circuit court or by the justice of the Supreme Court assigned to the circuit, and the appeal bond may be approved by either. Now, inasmuch as this bill makes the district judges part of this system, and appeals are intended to be taken from their judgments to the court of appeals, I can see nothing inconsistent in the district judge performing the very same action with reference to appeals in matters of this kind that is now performed by the circuit judges with reference to appeals from their courts to the Supreme Court.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator yield for a motion to adjourn? ["No!" "No!"] I thought we were to vote on this bill at four o'clock this evening, and it is now nearly half past four.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Florida is satisfied with the amendment on reflection, I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in line 6, section 9, to strike out the word "New Orleans" and insert "Jackson, Mississippi."

Mr. JONAS. I trust that amendment will not prevail. New Orleans is really the capital of the fifth circuit. A large portion of the Mississippi business comes to New Orleans and that city is more accessible to Texas and Florida, and I believe to the whole circuit, than any other point which could be named.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Debate is not in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. GEORGE. I think it is wrong, altogether wrong, to allow the Senator from Louisiana to make a speech for New Orleans and then not allow me to be heard for Jackson.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. As the Chair allowed the Senator from Louisiana to be heard, I hope the Senator from Mississippi will be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Senator from Mississippi will proceed. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GEORGE. Jackson, Mississippi, is very near the geographical center of the circuit, and it has all the facilities for holding the court that New Orleans has, good libraries, good hotels, and a building is being erected there for the purpose of holding the United States court. I think it is just and fair to the people of the circuit not to put this court of appeals on the extreme southern edge when there is a good place for holding it very near the center of the circuit.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, I ask for the enforcement of the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair gives notice that he will not allow any amendment or any question to be debated until the final vote on this bill, unless the agreement of yesterday is abrogated. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

The amendment was rejected.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senate to take up the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill. ["No!" "No!"] Well, I present the report, as I have the right to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report of a committee of conference is a privileged question and always in order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It will only take a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4466) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 21.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 23, 24, 27, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34, 35, 36, 37, and 39, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out from said amendment the words "for the orange and lemon and plants of the citrus family," and insert in lieu thereof the word "horticulture;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out by said Senate amendment, insert the following: "of which sum $1,000 shall be immediately available;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Add at the end of the amended paragraph the following: "of which sum $2,000 shall be immediately available;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: Strike out from the words proposed to be inserted by said amendment the words "one artesian well," and insert in lieu thereof "not exceeding three artesian wells," and strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out the words "five thousand," and insert in lieu thereof "two thousand five hundred," and the Senate agree to the same.

H. G. DAVIS,
P. B. PLUMB,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. K. VALENTINE,
JOHN T. RICH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HOAR. I call the attention of the Chair to the forty-ninth rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from West Virginia explain that report? It appears to be rather complicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to its consideration at this time?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we ought to go on with the court of appeals bill. When the Senate unanimously agrees upon doing a thing, we ought to do it.

Mr. GARLAND. This question has to be decided without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has to be decided without debate. Senators in favor of proceeding to the consideration of the conference report will say "ay;" those opposed "no." [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it. The noes have it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I give notice that as soon as the pending bill is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to take up the conference report.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 420) to establish a court of appeals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, the question is, Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senate to proceed at this time to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1049) amending an act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States." This is the bill which was reached this morning under the Anthony rule. Various Senators then suggested that they thought it could not be satisfactorily considered under that rule for the reason stated this morning, and I beg that the Senate may consider it. I think it is a great mistake to suppose that it is going to take necessarily any considerable time. I think an hour or two will be quite sufficient, because most of the criticisms made this morning were criticisms upon the law as it has existed for three years, and for three years without any prejudice to anybody in its operation, but, as the committee think, with very great benefit to the whole country. I hope the Senate will consent to take up the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not desire to antagonize the motion of the Senator from Tennessee——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will my friend from Kansas give way so that I may ask the Senate to take up the conference report?

Mr. PLUMB. We can get this matter disposed of in a moment, I think. I voted with the Senator from Tennessee this morning to take up the bill he has named, for I conceive that it is of importance; but I have been for weeks trying to bring to the attention of the Senate a bill which is of great interest to a large body of people, and I think it will take but a short time to dispose of it. I do not desire to antagonize the measure which the Senator from Tennessee has in charge, but I feel obliged to do so for the purpose of moving that the Senate shall take up Senate bill No. 67, known as the 5 per cent. bill. As I said, without desiring to antagonize the bill of the Senator from Tennessee, inasmuch as his bill was reached on the Calendar, I hope he will not press the matter and thereby put some persons disposed to be friendly toward his bill in antagonism with it.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say a single word. There are reasons why it is important for me to visit my home, and I desire to do so at an early day in the coming week. I esteem it a matter of very great importance that the bill I have indicated should be considered at an early day. If the Senate is inclined to pass it, it ought to be done at once; if the judgment of the Senate is against it it is important that the fact be known at once.

I of course do not desire to antagonize the measure represented by the Senator from Kansas. If there can be any understanding or agreement by which the bill that is in my charge can be considered at any reasonably early day, I shall most cheerfully give way to the Senator from Kansas or any other Senator who is clamoring for the consideration of a bill, but it is important that this bill should be considered and disposed of in whatever manner the Senate may feel disposed, and that they should dispose of it as promptly as possible.

Mr. PLUMB. I will say that so far as I am concerned (of course I am not authorized to speak for anybody else) I shall be entirely willing to observe the convenience of the Senator from Tennessee in regard to the consideration of his bill, and if it shall become necessary will agree to informally lay aside the bill I ask the Senate to consider in order to take up the bill which he has indicated. Beyond that, of course, I cannot go.

Mr. ALLISON and others. That arrangement will do.

Mr. HARRIS. That will be entirely satisfactory to me if it be understood that I shall not be met by an objection to the consideration of the bill under the timely yielding of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 67) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say that I will not give my consent to any arrangement such as has been proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill he has indicated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask simply the question if that is what is called the 5 per cent. bill?

Mr. PLUMB. It is the 5 per cent. bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Is the bill to be taken up with the understanding that when taken up it is to be laid aside to consider another bill?

Mr. PLUMB. No, not with that understanding.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood, although I was perhaps misled, that the Senator from Tennessee withdrew his motion for the consideration of the Board of Health bill with the understanding that this bill was to be taken up and then laid aside for the purpose of considering that bill.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me, I will state that I have made no motion; I asked the consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by me, and the Senator's colleague was kind enough to suggest that if it would be acquiesced in by the Senate he would consent to formally lay it aside, but I am aware that that would require the unanimous consent of the Senate. Hence, I added that if such an arrangement would be agreed to by the unanimous consent of the Senate it would be entirely satisfactory to me, and I would be very glad to have such an arrangement agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Such an arrangement, whether tacit or expressed, would be unjust. The Senator from Tennessee desires to call up a bill to add to certain powers attached to a board which, in my judgment, are already excessive. There is no special necessity for it, because the powers already exist. I think the Senate will remember that when the court of appeals bill was taken up there was a very general understanding that when it was concluded I was to have the floor to move the consideration of the bill reported upon the subject of bankruptcy. I trust the Senate will agree that both the motions pending may be voted down for the purpose of enabling me to move that as the next pending business before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is evident there will be some discussion about these bills. I believe the matter I presented is a privileged one and I have no doubt all will agree to it. It will take but a moment to consider the conference report.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to say that the bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the Geneva award, a measure which has been discussed in the Senate for many years, which has repeatedly had the assent of a majority of one branch or the other, is prior in claim, it seems to me, to either of the measures proposed by these gentlemen. I gave notice some six weeks ago of a purpose to move to take up that bill immediately after the disposition of the then pending measure. I yielded my priority of right to submit that question to the Senate to the honorable Senator from Illinois, because I was of opinion that a matter affecting certain individuals, however numerous and however large the amount might be, ought not to take precedence of a matter of general public policy like his bill.

After I had made my motion the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] expressed a purpose to move to take up the bankruptcy bill which was in his charge, and which it seemed to me had the same right of precedence on principle, as it was a matter of general public interest. But I do not desire to waive my precedence, if I have any under my notice, or to consent to take up other bills like the bill of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] or the bill of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] Therefore I do not want to agree that the Senator from Kansas, may take up his bill and then yield to somebody else.

Mr. PLUMB. I have only made the suggestion so far as I am individually concerned.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pending the motion of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] moves to proceed to the consideration of the conference committee report that he has named. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. I object. Let us decide this other question first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report?

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report is before the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. It has already been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report has been read, and the question is on concurring in the report.

The report was concurred in.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 67.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas about how long in his opinion it will take to consider the bill he moves?

Mr. PLUMB. I should think it ought to be concluded in a day or two days. It has been discussed in the Senate repeatedly before, and I am satisfied that one day, or two days at the outside, ought to close the consideration of the bill. Certainly the advocates of the bill are not going to take up any great length of time in debating it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I believe it can be considered in one day.

Mr. HARRIS. I will say again that I now give notice that if that bill shall be taken up, when it is concluded——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Apply the notice to any bill which may be taken up.

Mr. HARRIS. When any bill that is taken up is concluded, I shall insist upon a vote to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1049.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] Those who are in favor of the motion will say "ay;" contrary "no." [Putting the question.]

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the bill indicated by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] has the opposition of two members of the Committee on Public Lands, who gave notice of their opposition to it at the time it was reported to the Senate. The bill was brought before the Senate about eighteen months ago, I think, and defeated. It was voted down after full and complete debate. I do not know whether the opinion of the Senate has changed in that time, but very probably it has not. The bill then occupied several days in debate. There are a number of Senators on the floor now who were not here at the time the bill was then debated, and it will require at least three or four days, according to the ordinary run of business, to get through with the bill. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has notified us that he has some appropriation bill which will come up pretty early next week. I think if we take up the bill of the Senator from Kansas and interlard it with appropriation bills we shall probably get through with it about the middle of week after next.

Mr. ALLISON. I can say to the Senator from Alabama that I think no appropriation bill will interfere with the matter proposed by the Senator from Kansas, and I do not think it will take more than one or two days to consider that bill. One day I think will be ample unless the Senator from Alabama desires to elaborate his views; then it might take longer.

Mr. MORGAN. If I should desire to elaborate my views, I should certainly occupy as much of the time of the Senate as I should think proper.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MORGAN. I think it may take a considerable amount of time to present this bill in its proper light, and let us do it at the proper time. Within eighteen months the bill has had the consideration of the Senate, and it has been voted down; and I think we had better now turn our attention to some matters which have not been defeated in either House, some matters which are more entitled to the consideration of the country at this time than the bill moved by the Senator from Kansas.

I propose to ask the Senate to take up the Japanese indemnity bill. I have frequently made this request at the instance of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have moved it in the morning hour, and I have moved it with a view to get it before the Senate out of the morning hour. It is a bill, as I have remarked before, which has no particular advocate or friend, except some person who is charged with the official duty of taking care of it. Therefore it is allowed to pass by from day to day.

I do not intend to make any unnecessary or factious opposition to the bill of the honorable Senator from Kansas, but there are some gentlemen upon the Committee on Public Lands who heretofore have not participated in the debate on the question, who had not informed themselves fully upon it until recently, and who desire to be heard. It is a very important bill, involving a large amount of money, involving a brand-new principle in this Government, and I think it can afford to wait a little while until the Senate gets ready to hear that bill debated. The bankruptcy bill has the preference over the bill moved by the Senator from Kansas, and the Japanese indemnity bill was reported long before that bill came to the Senate, as I remember. I shall therefore ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Japanese indemnity bill, and I antagonize that request with the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. VOORHEES. As I understand the vote was taken upon the motion of the Senator from Kansas and at that stage of the proceedings when the vote was being called pro and con. the Senator from Alabama, it strikes me as somewhat out of place, addressed the Chair.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me to say that I used the utmost of my lung power to attract the attention of the Chair before the affirmative proposition was put.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not complain of any want of vigilance or diligence on the part of the Senator from Alabama, especially in the exercise of lung-power. There is no doubt about his vigilance in that respect. I was going to say to the Senator from Alabama that I sympathize with his effort to get up and have passed the Japanese indemnity bill. It is one of the things that I understand something about, and I think it has very high merit; but I hope the Senate will adhere to what I understood to be the vote a little while ago.

I know that the subject of bankruptcy needs some attention; but in the shape the business is now in I am satisfied the Senate will get along more rapidly by adopting the motion of the Senator from Kansas to proceed to the consideration of the bill he has moved. It is not going to take so long to dispose of that bill as Senators think. It does not embrace a wide range of discussion, if discussion stays by the points presented; they are few, they are simple, and they are clear.

Mr. VEST. There is but one equitable way in which to settle this difficulty. I have given notice here until it has become "damnable iteration" that I propose to call up the interoceanic ship-railway bill, I am afraid to say for how many weeks. As to the importance of these bills there must inevitably be a hung jury on any such issue. Every Senator thinks, of course, that the bill he is interested in and is championing here is most important; but there is one equitable way to settle it, and for myself I am willing to adopt that mode; and it is the only equitable way. Let these bills come up in the order in which they have been reported and placed upon the Calendar. If the Japanese indemnity bill, or the bankruptcy bill, or the 5 per cent. bill precedes the bill which I am pressing on the consideration of the Senate——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Or the bill in charge of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. VEST. Or the bill of the Senator from Tennessee, then let whichever bill has the precedence come up first; but this arbitrary way of scrambling for the floor in order to force a bill out of its turn upon the consideration of the Senate is inequitable and unjust. Let the Secretary of the Senate look at the Calendar and the reports of committees and see which bill has the precedence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that the bill moved by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] is prior in order upon the Calendar to the other bills which have been mentioned.

Mr. VEST. Then let that bill be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the statement of the Chair verified by an examination of the Calendar before the suggestion is acted upon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In order to settle this controversy, I move that the Senate do now adjourn. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. ALLISON and others. Let us settle this question first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky withdraw his motion to adjourn?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; I insist on it. It is nearly five o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate do now adjourn. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt. Senators favoring the motion to adjourn will rise and stand until counted.

The Senate refused to adjourn; there being on a division—ayes 26, noes 29.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 67.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion.

Mr. ALLISON and others. It is too late.

Mr. HARRIS. I raise the question of order that the call for the yeas and nays is too late. The result had been announced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair had announced the result.

Mr. PLUMB. I call for a vote on my motion.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to call attention to the fact that the Japanese indemnity bill is No. 171 in the order of business on the Calendar, having been reported February 7, 1882, so that to follow the equitable rule suggested by the Senator from Missouri that will be the first bill.

Mr. HOAR. Before the motion is put I should like to make an inquiry. The Senator from Missouri made a suggestion which seemed to meet with very general assent, that the bills which had been named should be taken up in the order in which they were reported. Can there be unanimous consent to that arrangement?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is, that they shall be considered in the order in which they stand on the Calendar?

Mr. HOAR. In their order on the Calendar.

Mr. PLUMB. The bill which I have moved is order of business No. 101, which is just seventy numbers ahead of the Japanese indemnity bill.

Mr. HOAR. Can we not have unanimous consent to the arrangement suggested by the Senator from Missouri? ["No." "No."]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection to such an arrangement. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 67.

Mr. VEST. Has that bill precedence in the order in which it was reported?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; it has not. I reported the Japanese indemnity bill from the Committee on Foreign Relations the 7th of February, and this bill was reported by the Senator from Kansas on the 13th of February.

Mr. PLUMB. But by some means the Senator from Alabama did not get his report in, and consequently his bill is seventy numbers behind on the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. The report was in, and it was by no such means that the bills changed their positions on the Calendar.

Mr. BAYARD. However desirable it may be for the Senate to have some fixed and definite rule for its proceedings I am satisfied that it cannot adopt the very cast-iron proposition of my friend from Missouri. Bills cannot be taken up and discussed in the Senate in the order of their introduction or in the order of their report. If the Senate proposes to conduct its business with due regard to economy of time, it must retain always its discretionary control over what measure it will take up. To adopt the rule suggested that because a bill is earlier in date as to its introduction or report it shall be first considered, would simply be at times to obstruct the whole progress of the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Delaware that no such proposition is pending. The Senator from Massachusetts asked unanimous consent to that arrangement and it was objected to.

Mr. BAYARD. I know that. The remarks I am making are upon the motion of the Senator from Kansas to take up a certain bill, and I make them just as my friend from Missouri made his when there was nothing before the Senate except the motion to take up the bill.

The 5 per cent. bill, I believe, will prove the fruitful source of debate, and it will be a long and contested question, as I have heard from remarks made around me. If it be so, I think whether we are to continue debate upon it or not will simply depend upon whether something more important shall be brought before the Senate; and the moment it is I hope the 5 per cent. bill will be postponed. I have no idea about giving what you may call the right of way to any one bill in the Senate without any consideration as to other measures of greater urgency perhaps. We must always pursue a course of public business here coupled with a sense of the comparative importance of such measures and of their comparative exigency at the time they are brought up, and we cannot adopt the rule of first in time first in thought.

Mr. PLATT. I think the Senator from Delaware is right that we cannot make any such rule as this with any justice whatever. It appears on the Calendar that the Geneva award bill was reported on the 30th of January, 1882; the Japanese indemnity bill on the 7th of February, and the 5 per cent. bill not until the 13th of February. How the latter bill got ahead upon the Calendar I do not know; but if we are to take these bills even in the order of their being reported, the Geneva award bill comes first, the Japanese indemnity bill second, and the 5 per cent. bill last.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state the explanation of that. I think I understand it thoroughly. The original bill which was reported from the Committee on Public Lands was a bill of the same title as this one, and was reported a long time before it appears on the Calendar to have been reported. Subsequently the Committee on Public Lands asked to correct the error, which was simply one of the clerk in putting into the hands of the chairman the wrong bill. That bill was reported, and it got the new date of the 13th of February. It had been on the Calendar for a month before. I ask for a vote on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 67.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Principal Legislative Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] He would vote "nay" on this question, and I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONAS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.] I do not know how he would vote, and I refrain from voting.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, (when his name was called.) I ask the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] whether my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] extends to this question?

Mr. GARLAND. It does.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 32, nays 16; as follows:

COPY OF SERVIAN TREATIES.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to make a request that the State Department be permitted to copy certain papers. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that Mr. Eugene Schuyler be allowed access to the Servian treaties, now before the Senate, in order that he may transcribe the text thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 4197) re-establishing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MILITARY LAND-WARRANT LOCATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (S. No. 67) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 12, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. On the 16th of January last, in the open session of the House, I offered a bill for the relief of Abraham Brafman, asking the remission of fines illegally imposed and collected under the internal-revenue laws. Accompanying the bill was a petition, respectfully addressed to Congress, praying for his relief, and a brief presenting the grounds upon which it was urged. I had carefully examined the papers, recognized the force of the argument presented, and in offering the bill, did so in the honest discharge of a simple duty to a prominent merchant citizen of Baltimore, which, in part, I have the honor of representing—that done, it was clearly understood by Brafman that my connection with the case ceased, except to facilitate the passage of any bill through the House which might receive a favorable report from its committee.

The object and desire of Brafman was to present his claim to this relief through the argument of his paid attorney, Lloyd B. Simpson, esq., of Baltimore, whose acquaintance I have just made, and with whom I have no connection, professional or otherwise, directly or indirectly, nor with Brafman or any person acting with or for him. At the time the papers were presented for reference I intended asking a reference to the Judiciary Committee, believing then, as I do now, that the legal questions involved would be more satisfactorily disposed of by a committee wholly constituted of lawyers, but was induced to change that reference to the Claims Committee in view of the practice enforced by the honorable Speaker. The point was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that it should go to the Committee on Ways and Means, but being waived it was referred to the Committee on Claims, where it lay dormant until Wednesday of last week.

About two weeks prior to that time I was visited by Mr. Simpson and Mr. Albert Moyer, a Washington attorney, who had been engaged in the interview, to aid in the prosecution of the claim before Congress, both of whom urged a change of reference to the Judiciary Committee. I sent them to the chairman of the Committee on Claims, and upon being assured that such a request should come from me as the member in charge of the bill, I solicited the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] to ask that change; and accordingly, on the 3d day of May, that committee asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] made the point that it should go to the Ways and Means, and upon the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] it was so referred. Whereupon I placed in the hands of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] of the sub-committee of that committee, having such matters in charge, a copy of the printed brief presented by Brafman's attorneys, asking immediate consideration, in view of the delay already incurred, and that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee, if he agreed with me it should be so referred. In all my connection with the case I have acted fairly, openly, and as it was my right and duty as a Representative. The next day there appeared in the Washington correspondence of the Baltimore Daily Herald the communication which I have marked and which I ask shall be read at the Clerk's desk before proceeding further.

The Clerk read as follows:

A BALTIMORE CLAIM.

Among the bills which have been pending for some time before the House Committee on Claims is that of Abraham Brafman, a clothier of Baltimore, who asks to be refunded $21,445.72, with interest from March 2, 1865, which he claims to have been illegally compelled to pay in the Treasury of the United States for manufacturing clothing. The committee to-day had the subject referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and among the papers accompanying the petition was a letter addressed to Speaker KEIFER, under date of January 17, 1882, by a writer signing himself "Maryland." He states:

"I wish to call your attention to the bill offered by Mr. HOBLITZELL, of Maryland, for internal-revenue fines, said to be, but not, illegally imposed and collected in the year 1865. This is about the coolest piece of impudence on record, after a period of seventeen years, to try and recover from the Government what was justly forfeited for offending the law by a man whose whole object was to make money, regardless of right or wrong. It is to be hoped that the records of the case and the man at the time may be uncovered, and the introduction of this bill will show that there is an ax to grind in the case, and the owner of the ax Representative HOBLITZELL."

In speaking of this matter Marshal Bonifant, of Maryland, in October, 1867, wrote to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he believed that what violations were committed by Mr. Brafman were done ignorantly and with no intention to defraud the Government, and that he would be pleased to hear of a remission of the fine imposed upon him. All the stock of Brafman was seized by officers of the Internal-Revenue Department on account of alleged frauds against the United States.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. That communication, containing a contemptible calumny, most infamously made, was brought to my attention Saturday last, and this is the first opportunity I have had since to bring to the attention of the House the flagrant breach of the right and privilege of my membership as a Representative upon this floor. It is due that I should inform the House that the honorable Speaker, upon inquiry, denies all knowledge of the letter in question, and he declares that it could not have been referred to the Committee on Claims without the indorsement of that reference appearing upon the back in the handwriting of his private secretary, which indorsement of reference does not appear upon that communication. Discovering no trace of it by indorsement or even the slightest impression of recollection of it having been received by the Speaker, to whom it was addressed, I probed further, and discovered from the clerk of the Committee on Claims that he remembers the receipt of that letter as well as its contents, and he declares that the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CROWLEY,] directed him to place it among the papers without knowledge of its contents, although it contained no fact which could furnish the slightest information to the committee charged with the consideration of the subject-matter in question, and although further there appears no entry of record on the books of the committee as it was the duty of the clerk to make, the same having been received by him after the original papers had been placed upon the files of the committee, and when the clerk must have known that the letter could not have been received by the Speaker, to whom it was addressed, because of the absence of his official indorsement of reference which always appeared upon communications referred by him to committees, and, I submit, must appear, as under our rules no member, chairman of a committee, or Speaker has the right to place upon the files of the House any communication addressed to the House or the Speaker except in pursuance of its printed rules, either in open House for reference or through the petition-box, and in every instance the name of the member offering the same must appear upon the communication as a voucher of responsibility.

A flagrant breach of the rules of this House has resulted in the surreptitious admission of a grossly slanderous paper affecting my representative character, and responsibility should be lodged somewhere, that the power of the House shall be invoked for the punishment of the offender, if the rights, privileges, and dignity of its members are to be preserved. I believe I am justified in saying that there was indifference of manner and lack of frankness in the conduct of the clerk to the Claims Committee when interrogated by me, and I fasten the responsibility upon him; but even should I err in believing him a consenting party to this transaction, such a display of ignorance of the plain duties of a clerk to a committee of this House under its rules, and such inattention in the performance of those duties which renders possible to one of its members such a wrong, demands summary treatment. He knew, or should have known, that the slanderous communication had never been presented to this House for reference, and he knew there was no mark or indication upon it that it had been received through the petition-box, which must appear in every instance, and he violated his plain duty when he placed it among the House papers without its authority, knowing its contents, for he admitted such knowledge, as well its anonymous character. And to my mind there appears a motive for the absence of that record which it was his duty to have made if it had been received in the ordinary channel. I ask, Mr. Speaker, as a member of this House in the exercise, fairly and honestly, of my rights and privileges the fullest protection against the incompetency or misconduct of any of its officers.

I submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it be adopted at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas a letter appeared in the Baltimore Herald of the 4th instant reflecting on Mr. HOBLITZELL, a Representative from the State of Maryland: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims are hereby directed to make immediate investigation into the conduct of the clerk of that committee in connection with the letter referred to and to report its action to the House at as early a day as possible.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HOBLITZELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4185) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

OMAHA INDIAN RESERVATION IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. VALENTINE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and consider at this time Senate bill No. 1255, to provide for the sale of a part of the reservation of the Omaha tribe of Indians in the State of Nebraska, and for other purposes. The Indians are anxious to dispose of this land in order that they may receive some interest on the money received for it, instead of holding the land without deriving any revenue from it.

Mr. HASKELL. I must object to that, unless it is first considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House.

Mr. VALENTINE. Then I will ask that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REMOVAL OF THE REMAINS OF GENERAL KILPATRICK.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have considered at this time a bill directing the Secretary of State to take the necessary steps for the removal of the remains of the late General Kilpatrick, minister to Chili, from Chili to the State of New Jersey for interment. I will state that a resolution upon this subject has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. A quorum of that committee was not present this morning, but the members of the committee now in the House have advised me to ask consent to introduce the bill and have it considered at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of State be directed to take the necessary steps for the removal of the remains of the late General Judson Kilpatrick, minister plenipotentiary to Chili, from Chili to his native State of New Jersey for interment, and that such money as is required for said purpose be, and the same is hereby, appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 6179) was received, read three several times, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON THE POST-OFFICE AND POST-ROADS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, May 16, after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of business to be indicated by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, not to include House bill No. 4668, to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports; this order not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation bills, and to continue in force from day to day thereafter until executed.

Mr. JOYCE. I object, unless prior special orders are also excepted.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to explain? Such an order as this was heretofore made by the House, but it applied to one day only, which day was occupied with other business. We now simply ask that this committee may have permission to occupy one day before the adjournment of Congress to bring up the important bills reported by them and now upon the Calendar. This will not interfere with existing special orders.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not understand that objection is made. Who objects?

Mr. JOYCE. I desire to know whether this resolution will cut out the special order which has been adopted by the House for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

Mr. BINGHAM. It will not.

The SPEAKER. It will not interfere with any prior special order.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is not so intended.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object, unless the bills to be considered are named.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects.

DONATIONS OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. JOYCE. I ask unanimous consent that the House bills upon the Speaker's table, donating condemned cannon, may be taken up and the amendments of the Senate thereto concurred in. Those amendments in general consist merely of the insertion of the words "cast-iron" before the word "cannon."

There being no objection, bills and a joint resolution of the following titles were severally taken up, and the amendments of the Senate thereto read, and concurred in:

A bill (H. R. No. 459) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the city of Topeka, Kansas, for monumental purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 605) donating cannon and cannon-balls for use and ornament about a suitable soldiers' monument at Portland, Maine;

A bill (H. R. No. 679) donating condemned cannon and cannon balls for monumental and other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1287) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for the soldiers' cemetery at Gallipolis, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 2195) donating condemned cast-iron cannon to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut;

A bill (H. R. No. 2552) to donate condemned cannon to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Association of Bellaire, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3001) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to Sampson Post No. 22 of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Rochester, New Hampshire, four condemned cannon;

A bill (H. R. No. 3333) to donate one condemned cast-iron cannon to the citizens of Otsego, Michigan;

A bill (H. R. No. 3738) to donate iron cannon to the township of Milan, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3877) donating condemned cannon to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Monumental Association of Lycoming County, Pennsylvania;

A bill (H. R. No. 4545) to authorize the Secretary of War to turn over to E. E. Sturtevant Post No. 2 of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Concord, New Hampshire, six condemned cannon;

A bill (H. R. No. 4585) to donate two condemed iron cannon to the city of Mansfield, Ohio, to be placed on the public square near the soldiers' bronze monument;

A bill (H. R. No. 4745) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for the soldiers' cemetery at Hamilton, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 5211) granting four condemned cannon to the town of Brandon, Vermont, to be placed near a soldiers' monument in said town;

A bill (H. R. No. 5240) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for monumental purposes; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the city of Waterloo, Iowa, three condemned cannon and four cannon-balls for decoration of soldiers' cemetery.

Mr. JOYCE moved to reconsider the various votes by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWNE. I ask unanimous consent that five pension bills of the House which have been returned by the Senate with amendments, and are now on the Speaker's table, be taken up for the purpose of concurring in the amendments. This will not occupy more than five minutes.

There was no objection.

WILLIAM THOMAS.

The first pension bill on the Speaker's table with Senate amendments was the bill (H. R. No. 2433) granting a pension to William Thomas.

The following amendment of the Senate was read and concurred in:

In line 4 strike out "Tennessee" and insert "Pennsylvania."

CECIL CLAY.

The next pension bill on the Speaker's table with Senate amendments was the bill (H. R. No. 5381) granting an increase of pension to Cecil Clay.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line 4 strike out "$42" and insert "$30."
Add to the bill the following:
"Said increase to commence from the passage of this act."

Mr. KENNA. I do not wish to antagonize the Committee on Invalid Pensions; but I would very much prefer non-concurrence in the amendments to this bill, so that there may be a conference with the Senate on the subject of the amendments.

Mr. BROWNE. In this case the House committee reported the rate of pension as $30; the House increased it to $42. The Senate has reduced the amount from $42 to $30, the rate originally reported by the committee of the House. I suggest to the gentleman that he may jeopardize the bill at this stage of the session by sending it to a committee of conference. I hope, therefore, the House will concur in the amendments.

Mr. KENNA. The facts of this case, as will be remembered by gentlemen who were present when the bill was considered, are that this officer, who was practically a brigadier-general at the time he received his injuries, lost one arm entirely, and received wounds in the hand of the other which practically disabled him in that. I have no doubt of the merit of the proposition to give him a pension of $42 a month, and I hope the House committee will insist upon it, but as I said at the outset I do not wish to antagonize the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I will not, therefore, make further opposition to concurrence in the amendments, unless the committee will assent to such a course.

The amendments were concurred in.

MODENA SMITH.

The next pension bill on the Speaker's table with Senate amendments was the bill (H. R. No. 1290) granting a pension to Modena Smith.

The following amendment of the Senate was read and concurred in:

Add to the bill the following:
"Subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws."

MARTHA A. WILLIAMSON.

The next bill returned from the Senate with an amendment was the bill (H. R. No. 967) granting a pension to Martha A. Williamson.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the following words:
"And pay her a pension at the rate of $17 per month from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was concurred in.

ALMIRA FARNSWORTH.

The next bill on the Speaker's table returned from the Senate with an amendment was the bill (H. R. No. 244) for the relief of Mrs. Almira Farnsworth.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out all after "Farnsworth," in line 3, to the end of the bill, and in lieu thereof insert "dependent mother of Edward Farnsworth, late a private in Company E, Twentieth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BROWNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the several amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. I rise to submit a privileged report, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3208) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 1.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same.

WM. H. FORNEY,
THOS. RYAN,
J. H. KETCHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

H. L. DAWES,
JAMES B. BECK,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope before this conference report is adopted some explanation will be made of the action of the conferences of the two Houses on the matters in dispute.

Mr. FORNEY. The conference report is accompanied by a statement required by the rules, and I ask it be read, as it makes a full explanation of all matters in dispute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Statement in explanation of report.

There were but two disagreeing votes, of which the Senate receded from one, and the House receded from the other, and the effect will be, if the report is adopted, as follows:

On the first amendment: In the second paragraph of the bill the words "including the conversion of smooth-bore cannon into rifles" are retained as a portion of the paragraph.

On the second amendment: The Secretary of War is authorized to issue on the requisition of a governor of a State bordering on the sea or a gulf, having a permanent camping ground for the encampment of the militia not less than six days annually, two heavy guns and four mortars, with carriages and platforms, if such can be spared, for the proper instruction and practice of the militia in heavy artillery drill, and for this purpose a suitable battery for these cannon will be constructed; and for said construction and the transportation of said cannon, and so forth, the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated for supplying each State that may so apply.

Mr. FORNEY. I move the conference report be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FORNEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROAD TO NATIONAL MILITARY CEMETERY, MOUND CITY, ILLINOIS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6004) reported from the Committee on Military Affairs as a substitute for House bill 3586, making an appropriation to construct a road and approaches from Mound City, Illinois, to the national military cemetery, and for other purposes; and it be now put on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a sum not to exceed $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing a road from Mound City, Illinois, to the Mound City National Military Cemetery, to be expended under the Secretary of War: Provided, That land necessary for the right of way, not less than one hundred feet in width, shall be granted and ceded to the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. What committee reported this bill?

Mr. THOMAS. It was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom it was referred. The report is short, and I should like to have it read, as it gives the fullest information.

The report was read, as follows:

This bill provides for the appropriation of $25,000 for the purpose of constructing a road from Mound City, Illinois, to the national cemetery near that place; also, for the purchase of a certain quantity of land; also, that the Secretary of War shall report to Congress his action at the next session of Congress.

Your committee find that there is located within one mile of Mound City, Illinois, an extensive and very beautiful national cemetery; that it has been improved by the national Government, equally with other national cemeteries; is protected by an extensive dike, built to keep out the backwater of the Ohio River; the grounds have been tastefully arranged and ornamented with choice trees and plants; each grave is marked by a white marble slab, and a handsome soldiers' monument has been erected by the State of Illinois, at a cost of $25,000.

The Inspector-General of the Army reported, when officially visiting this place, a few years since, "that the most attractive locality in this vicinity is our beautiful national cemetery."

The length of the contemplated road is about one mile, and its probable cost of construction, as estimated by the Quartermaster-General, would be about $25,000.

The present means of communication with Mound City is at all times disagreeable and difficult, often impassable on account of high water and the great depth of mud into which the road is converted by rains and overflow, the land being very low.

There has been so much pains taken to keep the national cemeteries in the best possible condition, they become more attractive and more beautiful each year, and the interest in them appears also to increase, and every attempt to popularize them would seem to accord well with the spirit and sentiment which have prompted the establishment of these national burial grounds for the honored dead of our late war.

The Congress has heretofore taken this view of the subject in appropriating moneys for similar roadways to the cemeteries at Vicksburgh, Chattanooga, and Fort Scott. In consultation with the Quartermaster-General, of the Department, charged with the care and improvement of the national cemeteries, he has suggested that the right of way shall be secured free of cost to the Government, by the local authorities, at least one hundred feet wide, and he also suggests other modifications of the bill which the committee approve and adopt.

Your committee therefore report back bill H. R. No. 3586, with the accompanying bill as a substitute, with recommendation that the substitute do pass.

Substitute for bill H. R. No. 3586, a bill to construct a road from Mound City, Illinois, to the Mound City National Military Cemetery.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a sum not to exceed $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing a road from Mound City, Illinois, to the Mound City National Military Cemetery, to be expended under the Secretary of War: Provided, The land necessary for the right of way, not less than one hundred feet in width, shall be granted and ceded to the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from Illinois who reported this bill whether it has the recommendation and meets the approval of the Secretary of War?

Mr. THOMAS. It has been recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is this to be a railroad or a turnpike?

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that the recommendation of the Secretary of War be incorporated into the report.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection to it being printed in the RECORD. The Secretary of War recommends this appropriation to be made, that is, the Quartermaster-General recommends the amount, and it is approved by the Secretary of War.

This national cemetry is located in the lowlands which are overflowed by the Ohio River in high water. It is protected by a high dike all around it, or levee, and there is no way to get there except through these overflowed lands.

Mr. RANDALL. Does not the gentleman think that $25,000 is a large sum to pay for building a mile of road one hundred feet in width?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is not, when you consider the character of the country through which the road is to be built.

Mr. THOMAS. Besides, it is contemplated that only so much as may be necessary for the construction of the road is to be expended.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The country is swampy and difficult to build a road through. I know myself that this road is very necessary, and I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee seems to contemplate that the title to this land over which the road is to be constructed shall be vested in the United States without charge. The bill, however, does not so provide. I ask that the proviso to the bill be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That land necessary for the right of way, not less than one hundred feet in width, shall be granted and ceded to the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Now I move to amend by adding the words "without charge or cost to the United States." That is within the terms of the report, but evidently not covered by the language of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMAS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. REED. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the bill relating to the distribution of the Geneva award fund, on which the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. REED. Last night we ordered the previous question without any understanding that the minority might offer their bill and have a vote upon it. It is understood of course, however, and that was the intention, that the minority should have a vote upon their bill.

There is also a verbal amendment to be made in the bill of the committee as printed; in section 3 of the bill where the existence of the court is limited to one year it should be two years; and that the claims to be filed with the clerk of said court within six months as printed in the bill should read within four months.

Mr. HOOKER. I object to any amendment not covered by the previous question, unless the gentleman will agree to extend the time for debate.

Mr. REED. Well, if the gentleman from Mississippi chooses to object in view of the arrangement arrived at yesterday evening, I will have to yield to him out of the brief time remaining; but I hope the gentleman will not insist upon an extension of the time after the agreement made and after the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. HOOKER. There was no agreement that amendments might be submitted to the bill. I shall object to all amendments unless the gentleman sees proper to extend the time allowed for debate.

Mr. REED. I have no power to extend the time after the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question to the House. The gentleman from Maine asks that the previous question ordered upon the bill shall include the right to offer the substitute of the minority——

Mr. HOOKER. I have no objection to that. I think it proper that the minority report should be regarded as pending under the previous question; but I object to any amendment not actually covered by the agreement.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Is it understood that the bill of the minority is considered as pending?

Mr. REED. It is so understood. The motion now is that the verbal corrections which I have suggested may also be made to the bill, under the operation of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi, as the Chair understands, objects to that.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then I object to allowing a vote on the minority report.

Mr. REED. I do not think the gentleman ought to object to that under the arrangement made last night. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. I object to allowing a vote upon the substitute, if unanimous consent is required, if the gentleman from Mississippi insists on his objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that while the proposition to consider the previous question as ordered upon the bill was not very distinctly stated, yet the substitute was treated all through as though pending, and ought now to be considered as pending under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. REED. Certainly, and the amendments which I have suggested are merely verbal corrections to the text of the bill.

Mr. HOOKER. There was no unanimous consent given except to consider the bill of the committee and the minority report. The previous question was ordered with that understanding.

Mr. REED. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole ruled the other day at the request of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that such verbal corrections could be properly made by the House after the previous question had been ordered.

Mr. HOOKER. I cannot help that. I must object to any amendments to this bill if no opportunity is to be given for further discussion.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from Mississippi will insist upon his objection, I shall be compelled to give him ten minutes, if that will be satisfactory.

Mr. HOOKER. That will be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. HASKELL. When a bill is reported from a committee of this House with a recommendation that it be passed, and the previous question is ordered upon it, that order covers not only the bill but such verbal amendments as are necessary to perfect its text to meet the views of the committee reporting it. Otherwise the House, after the previous question is ordered, could be excluded from correcting a typographical error. That has been the rule and the practice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the amendments suggested by the gentleman from Maine, however, to be additional amendments, and not part of the original bill.

Mr. REED. Do I understand the Chair to rule that the amendments are in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made no ruling.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I understand the gentleman from Mississippi has withdrawn his objection.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Mississippi has withdrawn his objection, the Chair will hold that by unanimous consent the amendments suggested are considered as pending.

Mr. HOOKER. I withdraw the objection, with the understanding that the gentleman from Maine has yielded me ten minutes.

Mr. REED. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then I withdraw my objection to the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands, then, that there is no objection to the proposed modification or amendment to the original bill. The gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REED. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I have nobody to represent who has any interest in this question, so far as my own constituency is concerned, and I therefore think I can look at the question from a dispassionate and disinterested point of view. It has been contended by the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] in the few remarks which he submitted, and by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. CONVERSE,] that in distributing this fund it ought to be distributed to the persons who sustained the losses. I admit the proposition. I concede the truth of the position that in distributing this fund which was paid in solido by Great Britain to reimburse the citizens of this country for losses sustained by the inculpated steamers destroying the cargoes and vessels during the war—I admit the position that it ought to be paid to the people who sustained the losses.

This, to my mind, is simply a cold legal question, with which sentiment has little to do. We ought to distribute this fund according to law, equity, and justice. Who, then, ought to be entitled to this fund? It was well understood, sir, in the arbitration which was made at Geneva, and in the award which the English and the American arbitrators agreed upon, that this sum of fifteen and a half million dollars was to be paid in full to the United States, England never agreeing to advance one single dollar beyond it to compensate anybody, but agreeing to it to compensate those alone who sustained losses.

It is said that the fund ought to be paid to those who paid the war premiums in consequence of the losses sustained by the inculpated vessels. Who paid the war premiums? Wherever a vessel successfully ran into port and the war premiums were paid by owners of the vessel and the cargo, who paid the war premium? The men who bought the goods that were successfully brought into port. And therefore if there is equity in paying to those who lost, then there is equity in paying to the men who had to pay the additional price for the goods and to pay the war premiums.

But it is said, sir, that you ought not to pay anything to the insurance companies because they are bloated corporations. Well, the insurance companies are composed of men, and while the company, in the language of my friend from Ohio, does not die, the men who compose the company die every day. If they have insured a vessel and that vessel and its cargo have been lost and they have paid the loss, would the honorable gentlemen on the other side who present the report of the majority of the committee give it again to the people who have already been paid? If the insurance companies have paid the loss of vessel and of cargo, and the man has received it from the insurance company, although he may have paid a war premium, is he still entitled to receive the amounts again? What do you propose by the present bill? You propose to pay out $668,313.69 to these very insurance companies for losses sustained by exculpated vessels. That is the very effect and force and object of this bill of the majority. Now, sir, I say that if the insurance companies have paid the loss of the vessels and the loss of the cargo I can see no reason why in equity and justice they should not be subrogated to the rights of the men who have been actual losers. Is not that equity and justice? I cannot see any reason why they should not be allowed to claim their share of this fund in proportion as they have paid the actual losses of the men who have insured with them.

In the case of West against The United States, in answer to what my friend from Ohio has said, I shall quote what the court says:

> Do not national courtesy and good faith require of us to suppose that Congress, in creating this court, never intended we should distribute this fund other than for the purposes for which Great Britain supposed she was paying it? For instance, suppose Congress had chosen to keep half the fund and convert it into the Treasury of the nation, or had directed this court to distribute it among those whose commercial interests had been injured by the terror and alarm caused by the insurgent cruisers, or among those who had suffered loss by the depredations of rebel cruisers other than the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah. In such cases, would not Great Britain have had cause to complain that she had been misled, overreached, deceived? Would our Government have been acting in good faith in making such disposition of this fund?

That is what the court says in adjudicating upon this question in the case of West vs. The United States.

In the same connection I quote the following remarks by Mr. Thurman in the Senate:

> Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not know that I have ever witnessed quite such a proceeding as we have now before us. The great contest from the very first bill that was introduced on this subject has been whether the insurance companies should be paid. They had claims according to as well-settled law as ever existed in the world. Their right to present those claims, their right to stand in the shoes of those who lost the property captured, was expressly admitted by the attorney-general of Great Britain before the Geneva tribunal. No denial of their right to present those claims was ever made, either by the Government of the United States or by the Government of Great Britain. On the contrary, the Government of the United States, when presenting the claims, the Government of Great Britain speaking through its attorney-general, admitted that the insurance companies had the right to present those claims. It admitted in the most distinct and clear language, both by its attorney-general and by the judgment of its arbitrators at Geneva, that the insurance companies were subrogated to the rights of the insured.

The following statement shows the claims filed under the several classes:

Statement of amount of claims for losses by the so-called exculpated cruisers—from revised list of claims.

Boston	$400 00
Chickamauga	183,070 00
Georgia	431,160 00
Jefferson Davis	7,752 00
Nashville	108,433 95
Retribution	29,018 53
Sallie	5,540 00
Sumter	179,697 67
Tallahassee	836,841 83
Shenandoah, ante Melbourne	554,810 49
Total	2,336,725 19

Of this there are claimed by the insurance companies for losses by the—

Boston	$400 00
Chickamauga	115,509 00
Georgia	166,900 00
Jefferson Davis	4,752 00
Nashville	16,050 00
Retribution	10,852 00
Sallie	5,540 00
Tallahassee	205,633 68
Shenandoah	142,677 00
Total	668,313 68

Leaving the total amount claimed by other parties $1,668,411.51.

The claims for war premiums have amounted to $6,328,869.77, namely, three hundred and forty-one claims filed before May 15, 1872, (from revised list,) $6,146,219.71; sixteen claims filed after that date, (Miscellaneous Document No. 270, House of Representatives, first session Forty-third Congress,) $182,650.06.

The total claims by insurance companies for losses by inculpated cruisers amount to (including four years' interest at 4 per cent.) $5,644,365.12.

It appears, then, that the total claims in each class provided for in the bill submitted by the majority are as follows:

First class	$1,668,411 51
Interest	266,945 84
Total		$1,935,357 35
Second class	6,328,869 77
Interest	1,012,619 16
Total		7,341,488 93
Third class	5,534,145 30
Interest	885,463 22
Total		6,419,608 52
Total of three classes		15,696,454 80

Now, if losses were actually sustained, and those losses were not paid by the insurance companies, clearly the party sustaining the loss of the vessel and cargo would have a right to come here and show his loss and receive his portion of the money. If insurance companies have paid those losses, the loss of the vessel and the loss of the cargo, I put it to the conscience of every man who has to vote upon this question whether they ought not to be under the national law as they would be under the adjudication of any court in any State sitting in equity or at law—whether they ought not to be subrogated to the rights of the actual losers whose losses they have sustained and paid?

Is there any equity and justice in the denial of this? And is it not the universal rule of law which prevails in the tribunals of the States both at law and in equity that wherever a party has paid in good faith the loss which has been sustained by the actual loser he has a right to be subrogated to the rights of the party whose losses he has paid.

It is said that the insurance companies grew wealthy. Ay, sir, and the importers grew wealthy. The men who paid the war premiums grew wealthy. All over your country will be found men in the various branches and pursuits of commercial life who have grown to be men of colossal fortunes, and millionaires, who paid the war premiums. Upon what principle of equity or justice, therefore, will you take this money which England has paid into your Treasury and say you will apply it to these men who paid the war premiums, and who charged the war premiums on their goods?

While it is true that they had to compete in foreign markets with vessels not paying the war premiums, in our own country wherever they imported in sufficiently large quantities to control the market, they added the war premiums to the price of their goods, and thus became, in many instances, as wealthy as the insurance companies themselves.

But whatever the result, if the insurance companies can demonstrate that they have paid these losses actually and in good faith, whatever premiums they might have received, however wealthy they might have grown, they are entitled to their legal rights under the adjudication which was made by this tribunal at Geneva. And being entitled to their legal rights, certainly you cannot take from them that which the law and equity and justice and fair dealing between man and man entitle them to upon the ground that they charged excessive prices for their insurance during the war.

If you can do that in the case of the insurance companies, then upon the same principle you might say that the men who paid the war premiums should not be paid out of this fund because they charged excessive prices for their goods, being obliged to add the war premiums to the cost of their goods in order to sell them at a profit. No argument, therefore, can be made against the insurance companies that cannot be made with equal force against the war-premium men.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REED. I now yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] for five minutes.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Mr. Speaker, I rise not to discuss the legal points which have been elaborated on the subject of this bill, but to state a few reasons why I shall vote for the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

First of all, I understand, contrary to what seems to be argued here, that the sum in solido which the United States received from Great Britain was in compensation for damages arising, not from the violation or neglect of the duties of a neutral, but from a violation of the duties of a friend. There was no war between this country and another power friendly to Great Britain. Ours was a country with friendly relations to Great Britain, engaged in putting down an insurrection at home. The public sentiment of England and the selfishness of those there interested in speculation caused to our country such damage as no fifteen or fifty millions of dollars could compensate for.

This country, instead of going to war about it, as we had a right to do if we chose, instead of inflicting punishment upon our faithless friend, this country agreed to go into a friendly convention, and to there show some of the many evidences of losses which we had sustained, some small portion of the great damage which the country had suffered in every way; to take there the claims most clearly proven and the most prominent and use them to persuade the tribunal that our demands were just.

Now, I do not understand that in the end this Government undertook simply to be the trustee of the money which we received from Great Britain and to distribute it among a few persons. I understand that in lieu of any other redress we accepted a sum of money, fifteen and a half millions of dollars, in compensation for all the damages which we had sustained, and we were to distribute that money according to justice and equity, as our Government pleased.

If that is the case, and I believe it to be the case, then, after having paid out of that $15,000,000 the sum of $5,500,000 upon claims that had been placed before the Geneva tribunal and used as a basis of discussion, the remainder is in the hands of the Government of the United States, and we have a right, if we please, to hold it as a general compensation to be covered into the public Treasury for the benefit of the nation.

But as our people have suffered unequally, the Government is at liberty to undertake to compensate some of our citizens who have suffered more than others by a distribution of the remaining sum, or so much thereof as the Government may choose to devote to that purpose. If I am right in believing that is the position in which the fund now stands in the hands of the Government, then this bill of the majority of the committee proposes an equitable method to reach and compensate some at least of the chief sufferers.

My friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] a few minutes ago asserted in point of fact that the great merchants and importers of this country had compensated themselves for the war premiums which they had been obliged to pay by charging them upon the goods which they sold, collecting them off the consumers. Now, there may be some truth in that statement, in reference to some parties; but in regard to the merchants of San Francisco, I will undertake to say there is no truth in the statement, and I will give my reasons for so saying.

San Francisco was obliged to get her goods by way of the Horn. She had to get them in coastwise vessels; she could not import them under a foreign flag. The English exporters and dealers could send their goods directly from England to our market; so that by the time the goods which our merchants in California had ordered in New York and shipped by way of the Horn reached San Francisco our merchants met competitors in the markets who were selling goods brought there by English vessels, and their prices were regulated accordingly, not by adding to the cost of the goods the war premiums, the freight, and insurance, but by placing them at such prices as enabled them to sell in competition with those parties who obtained their goods direct from Europe and had to pay no war premiums.

So with regard to their exports which they had to send round by the Horn. They were obliged to send them in coastwise vessels, and when they arrived at New York they were met by a competition with goods directly from Europe, and had no chance to add the war premiums to the cost of their goods.

It is therefore true that a portion of the community, and a very large portion of the community who bravely sustained the commercial flag of the country at their own expense, had no opportunity to recoup the additional expenses which the war premiums imposed upon them. I therefore shall vote in favor of the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. RAY.]

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, it appears that we have $10,000,000, in round numbers, remaining in the Treasury which was paid by Great Britain to settle the Geneva award. What was it paid for? It was not paid for the benefit of American insurance companies; it was not paid to reimburse the war-premium men; it was not paid because some of our citizens had their property destroyed by the exculpated rebel cruisers. But it was paid on account of the destruction of property of American citizens by the inculpated cruisers—the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah after it left the British port of Melbourne. The $15,500,000 which England paid into our Treasury was England's money before it was paid to us. After payment it became the money of the United States. It became the money of the Government and not the property of any citizen or corporation here. It was thus paid and received pursuant to the treaty of Washington, in negotiating which the United States Government expressly reserved the right to distribute among its own citizens whatever sum the tribunal of arbitration might award in its favor according to its own will and pleasure. Distribution by our Government means the concurrent action of the Senate and House of Representatives upon the subject, with the approval of the President.

What has been done with the rest of this Geneva award money? About $10,000,000 was distributed under the act of Congress passed June 23, 1874. To whom was it distributed by the provisions of that act? To those whose property had been destroyed by the three inculpated cruisers. On what principle was this distribution made? Upon the principle of net loss, and that alone. The doctrine of double reimbursement or the payment of gross losses was carefully prohibited by the express terms of the act of 1874. By that act of Congress nobody had any standing before the court of commissioners of Alabama claims except those whose property had been destroyed by the inculpated cruisers, and every claimant was bound to account for all compensation or indemnity received by him from any insurance company or otherwise, and could recover only the balance of damage actually suffered, or, in other words, his net loss. And if an insurance company preferred a claim before the commissioners for allowance it was bound by the provisions of the statute to show to the satisfaction of the court that the amount of its losses by war risks during the late rebellion exceeded the amount of its war premiums, and recovery was allowed only for the excess of loss.

The question recurs, What shall we do with the balance in the Treasury? Shall we continue its distribution, governed by the cardinal principles of the act of 1874, by making reimbursement for net losses only, as the bill reported by the majority of the Judiciary Committee provides? Or shall we give the money to the insurance companies, who in fact lost nothing while the war lasted, but on the contrary during that trying period fattened upon the misfortunes of their countrymen. The balance of this fund still belongs to the Government, just as the whole did when it was paid. The Government owns the money absolutely. The whole title to the award, both legal and equitable, vested in the United States. The Government has neither received nor held this money as a trustee for anybody. The best considered legal authorities here and in England clearly and fully sustain these views. Any distribution is an act of grace, morality, and good conscience on the part of the Government in behalf of its citizens.

I regret that some have said in this discussion, "Let the Government keep this money," and are opposed to any distribution. To my mind, sir, such a course, under the circumstances, would fall little short of national dishonor. Better let the insurance companies have what remains or divide it pro rata among those who have been paid already.

Gentlemen seem to forget the fact that this fund was not paid or received for the loss of Government property. Indeed the Government lost little or no property by the confederate cruisers. Loyal citizens appealed to the Government in vain for protection to person and property on the high seas during the war. Hence nearly all of our prudent business men owning or sailing or using American ships, in order to save themselves from impending financial loss or ruin were obliged to obtain insurance against war perils by the payment of heavy war premiums. The war-premium men, while the rebellion was flagrant and ever since, have borne equally with all other good citizens their proper share of the national burdens. They paid their taxes; they experienced all the ordinary risks of commerce and vicissitudes of trade which others did who patronized foreign vessels, and they paid millions of dollars to insurance companies besides. Good judges have estimated that the insurance companies paid out in losses only about $5,000,000 on account of war risks, while they received in war premiums about $10,000,000.

I think the war-premium men have the strongest equitable right to the balance of the fund in the Treasury of any class of claimants. The committee's bill provides, first, for the payment of those who suffered losses from the exculpated cruisers, and then the balance goes to the war-premium men. Now, the exculpated-cruiser men took their chances. They purposely omitted to insure; they sailed with the peril of rebel capture and destruction before their eyes; they traversed dangerous seas with full knowledge of the enemy's presence in overpowering force, and as might reasonably have been foreseen and expected many vessels and cargoes were lost, whereas, had they paid war premiums and obtained insurance, as prudent and careful business men ought to have done under the circumstances, that would have been their only practical loss. But there is enough money in the Treasury for both classes of claimants if we do not allow the insurance companies to get four or five millions of dollars to which they are not entitled legally, equitably, or morally.

The insurance companies claim to participate in this distribution of the remainder of the Geneva award by right of subrogation. They contend because they have paid their policies of insurance placed upon vessels and cargoes destroyed by the inculpated cruisers, and because the owners of such vessels and cargoes were required to deduct from the value thereof whatever had been received as insurance thereon, that a share of this money rightfully belongs to them according to the doctrine of subrogation. What is subrogation in a legal sense? It is the substitution of one person in the place of another, and giving him the other's rights; it is the mode by which a third person who pays a creditor succeeds to the creditor's rights against the debtor.

Clearly upon the admitted facts before us no right of subrogation exists in favor of the insurance companies. As between the insurer and the assured whose property was captured or destroyed by confederate cruisers, the relation of debtor and creditor arose from the terms of the policy or contract. Upon payment of the loss by the insurer or debtor the creditor's debt was extinguished. But there was nothing left of the property itself, or any right of action growing out of its capture or destruction into which the insurer could by any possibility be subrogated. The title to a vessel or cargo was ipso facto changed upon its capture. It became the captor's property by force of arms and the laws of war.

In the matter before the House both parties to the insurance policies were the subjects and citizens of the United States, one of the belligerent parties in the late civil war. When the land or naval forces of the confederacy captured the property of the United States or of its citizens on land or sea the confederacy did not become a debtor to anybody on account of the capture, in any legal or equitable sense whatever. Neither the owner of the property insured nor the insurance company who paid a loss under such circumstances had any claim of any sort against the confederate government. Much less did either party to the policy have a claim against England for the loss on account of her omission to fulfill the duty of a neutral power toward the belligerents during the conflict. And still less did either party acquire a claim against the United States by subrogation in any legal or equitable view, as understood or decided by the courts, on account of the recovery of the $15,500,000 of Great Britain before the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva. Of all the claimants the insurance companies have the least pretense of right to participate in the distribution. So we see that the doctrine of subrogation—the only ground upon which the insurance companies base their claim to share in the distribution—has no application to the case before us.

We are here to do the will of our constituents, whose public servants we are. Will any gentleman on either side of the Chamber assert that the constituency which elected him would vote in favor of allowing the insurance companies to receive a share of this fund after having already had their day in court and recovered their net losses? I do not believe a Congressional district in the Union would so decide. We ought in the decision of this matter to reflect the will of those who sent us here, and whom we have the honor to represent.

In order to distribute this fund at all you are obliged to adopt the doctrine which is so well and ably stated in the majority report by the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. REED,] namely, those broad and comprehensive principles of equity and good conscience which ought to obtain in all the dealings and transactions between a just government and its citizens.

Mr. REED. I now yield for twenty minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HAMMOND.]

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the argument I should have made if I had time is contained in the minority report, and I will avail myself of the leave given yesterday to print that as an appendix to the remarks I make this morning.

There were five bills referred to the Judiciary Committee of this House on this subject. Each one of those bills seeks to re-establish the commission to determine this question.

The first bill is by Mr. COBB, of Indiana, introduced on December 13, 1881. It provided for payment for vessels and cruisers attacked and taken on the high seas, or pursued therefrom, although the loss or damage occurred within four miles, &c. It provided for payment to persons who lost from actual compulsory sale made of vessels in foreign ports by reason of the danger of capture or destruction by confederate cruisers; secondly, for payment of certain whalers; thirdly, for an additional 2 per cent. to certain claimants already paid, and fourthly, to the war premium men.

The next bill in order was one by Mr. REED, No. 602, December 13, 1881. That bill had five sections, and part of the second section, amending the bill of 1874, was as follows:

> That it shall be the duty of said court to receive and examine all claims admissible under this act that may be presented to it directly resulting from damage caused by the so-called insurgent cruisers and their tenders which operated on the high seas during the late rebellion, and to decide upon the amount and validity of such claims in conformity with the provisions hereinafter contained, and according to the principles of law and the merits of the several cases.

And there is nothing in that bill restricting the class of claimants at all.

On the same day Mr. REED introduced another bill, No. 603, with ten sections; and in that there is a restriction, first, to pay the exculpated cruisers; and, secondly, the war premiums, excluding all the other claims mentioned in COBB's bill.

On the 9th of January, 1882, a bill was introduced by Mr. FORD, which is practically the same with Mr. COBB's.

And lastly, on the 27th of April, 1882, is a bill introduced by Mr. REED, which is now the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Besides these there is also the resolution offered by Mr. FROST, of Missouri, on the 17th of April, 1882, resolving that the whole fund should remain in the Treasury.

Now, the committee reported this last-mentioned bill, and the minority reported a substitute for it. I will have time only to show the principal points of contrast between the two. I will remark, in passing, that what is the minority report now was the majority report in 1878, the last time the subject was reported upon. It is easy to see how the change in the personnel of the committee may change the character of the report; but I mention that to avoid the weight that might be given by supposing the minority report was a new thought by a few persons.

I take the bill No. 4197, reported by the committee, and the substitute of the minority, which is printed on page 33 of the RECORD this morning and also appears on page 30 of the report which I hold in my hand. First, the majority establishes a new court and gives new salaries. This bill (the minority) submits the question to the existing Court of Claims. The majority's bill allows no appeal from the decision of the commission though two of them may make a decision. The minority's bill allows an appeal to the Supreme Court either by the claimant or the United States, and gives to these cases absolute precedence over all others in the Supreme Court. I will not stop to comment upon the contrast between the two tribunals which has heretofore been made, but simply call attention to the language of Mr. Butler, which will be found on page 28 of this report, in which he plainly intimates that with these many millions of dollars at stake will not be safe, may not be honestly handled by a commission not surrounded by the usual sanctity of a court, but approachable by everybody; not practiced before exclusively by lawyers but by claim agents as well, who he says are rather bad fellows. I call attention to that and his high encomium on the court of the United States as a reason for the adoption of the minority's bill.

The United States has eight times before acted as the minority recommend, and perhaps more frequently. I know of eight different occasions when money has been received from other nations to be distributed by this Government among its citizens, namely, following cases: From Great Britain in 1826; from Denmark in 1830; from France in 1831; from the Two Sicilies in 1832; from Spain in 1834; from Peru in 1841; Brazil in 1849, and China in 1858. In every one of these cases the distribution was made upon the same basis that we have set out in this minority bill upon a claim of right according to equity, justice, and the law of nations. But to the last one to which I have referred I desire to call especial attention, because the report in that case was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CRAPO,] and was unanimous from his committee. He used this language in reference to the subrogation of insurance:

> Your committee are satisfied, from the evidence submitted to them, that it is but just that the underwriters should be allowed to present the evidence which if they had time or proper notice, would have been presented to the commissioners, to some competent tribunal for a final decision as to the justice of their claim.
> * * * * * * *
> Your committee are of the opinion that the Court of Claims is the tribunal by which questions of this character should be heard and determined.

That report was made in 1878 and was adopted unanimously by the House.

The bill of the majority of the committee excludes everybody but the exculpated cruisers and the war-premium men. The bill of the minority allows all claimants to come into court. It will take all the claimants under Mr. REED's first bill, or Mr. COBB's bill, or the bill of Mr. FORD. It will allow the sailors mentioned yesterday to come in, as well as those who received personal injury, all of whom are excluded by the bill of the majority. I will remark further that the majority bill places the ship-owners ahead of the war-premium men, by what philosophy I do not know. There is no mention of any reason for it in the report, and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. RAY] who has just taken his seat made an argument to show that the war-premium men ought to be paid in preference to the exculpated cruisers. But the bill of the majority says they shall not be paid at all until all the exculpated-cruiser losses are paid.

The next difference is as to the basis of distribution. The majority of the committee fix a basis. They say we do not go on law, logic, analogy, or anything of that kind, but from what we know of the facts we determine that there shall be but two classes paid, and paid in this order and in none other. Now, the bill of the minority provides that the court shall determine what each claimant is entitled to recover under said treaty and award according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations. If a man has no right, when we furnish a tribunal, to recover anything under the treaty and award according to the law of nations and the principles of equity and justice, we say let the money stay in the Treasury. I do not understand that this money is ours to do with it as we please, in that absolute sense which some gentlemen speak of; nor does the committee so understand. While the United States cannot be a technical legal trustee, the decision in the Rustomjee case—the decisions in all cases—is that the moral obligation of the government for whose favor the award is made is to do right with the money as to the persons for whose benefit it was received. Now, we wish to pay all of the persons who ought to be paid. The minority's bill pays everybody or allows everybody to present their claims, and if none are entitled to the fund it leaves the money where it is now, in the Treasury.

But some gentlemen may take a holy horror at this. They say it would be very unfair to England to get money from her in that way and keep it in our Treasury. If that is true, I would pay the money back to England. But she does not seem to have any friend here except Mr. FROST. No; Mr. FROST wants to keep it. But it will be time enough to deal with that question when we come to it.

The important question is whether there are any of our citizens who ought to have this money. The House has seen from the debate here that there is no agreement about the facts; there is no agreement about the law; there is no agreement about the meaning of equity or justice or the law of nations in this case. Everybody who speaks, nearly, expresses a different opinion from every other, and would arrive at a different conclusion if allowed to decide it for himself. Therefore this committee, closing up its argument, declared:

> Your committee concluded, therefore, without expressing any opinion of their own in relation to the merits of any particular claim or class of claims to the unexpended balance of this fund, that it would be better as a precedent for future cases, better for the Government, and better for all parties claiming to have an equitable interest in it, to commit the adjudication and determination of all questions touching its distribution to the Court of Claims in the first instance, with the right in any party aggrieved to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, with authority to render a judgment in favor of each claimant who was an actual sufferer, &c.

That seems to be right. It seems to us to be the only solution of the difficulty. It may be entirely wrong, but we ought not to be placed in the false position of thereby advocating any particular party. We expressly avoid that. We expressly say, "as you have presented the claim of one party we will present the adverse claim of another party to show you there is a real contention, and there being a real contention we will have a court to decide this question."

The gentleman on the other side [Mr. RAY] said the war-premium men had paid taxes and ought to get this money. Now, upon what principle will we select out certain men and pay them if this money belongs to the United States absolutely? Why will you exclude the men whose property was destroyed in 1864 by the Saint Alban's raiders? Why will you exclude the men whose ships were robbed on Lake Erie in 1864 by raiders? Those raiders were confederates. They came from England, and England was as much liable for their escape by her carlessness as she was for the escape of these cruisers where the Geneva tribunal has found that up to a certain moment she had proper notice. Upon what principle will you exclude one and let in the others? I cannot see on what principle you can so decide.

If this is money received from England, to be paid to Americans who have suffered by reason of English carelessness, why confine it to those who have suffered by the carelessness of England in allowing armed ships to leave her ports and exclude those who have suffered from her carelessness in allowing armed men to leave her territory and come over and prey upon the property of our citizens? Where is the philosophy of it? There is none. If we are absolutely free, why give it to the ship-owners; why give it to the rich men who have the war-premium claims; why give it to the insurance-men to the exclusion of one, for instance, whose arm was shot off in the last battle of the war, or of the widow whose husband was killed in the last battle of the war? May she not say to the Government, "You complained of England that by her early recognition of the confederacy she enabled it to prolong the war, and my husband went through this war perfectly well, perfectly healthy up to the last battle, and but for that prolongation of the war I would have been happy, the wife of a living man?" The argument is the same. There can be no good reason therefore in their position, except that you must be bound by the treaty and the award, and the law under the treaty and the award, which law is equity and justice according to the law of nations. And there is where we, the minority, propose to leave them. If there is nobody entitled to it under that law we will keep the money.

I know there are gentlemen here who will take a holy horror at doing that. There are men here who will sit down and complacently pat the fifteen millions of cotton money in our pockets, in the United States Treasury.

Mr. HOOKER. Sixty-eight millions.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Did I say fifteen millions? Well, sixty-eight millions. I made a mistake. They will pat it all the harder if it is that much. And yet they say it would be horrible not to pay this Maine ship-owner; it would be horrible not to pay this New York insurance-man or this New York war-premium man. I do not understand any such reasoning. If the Government has any money that does not belong to it which is due to anybody it ought pay it, and pay it quickly. And if it has money that no man can show a title to, either in law or equity or justice, we have no right to give it to anybody.

I will therefore first vote for the bill reported by the minority. It will not carry, perhaps, but if it does not I shall vote against the other bill. Perhaps I shall still be in the minority. Very likely. You may get another bill through here and it will go over to the Senate; and some big man like Mr. DAVIS will sit down upon it, as he has done in the Senate heretofore upon such bills, and you will have the Senate to blame and not us for keeping the money in the Treasury.

Gentlemen must entertain their views upon the question presented; they must express their views in their votes, and they will express them honestly no doubt. But let no man charge upon us of the minority an effort to do anything except that which we conceive to be right and proper.

APPENDIX.

Views of the minority of the committee.

Mr. N. J. HAMMOND presented the following as the views of the minority of the committee:

The United States and the Confederate States were at war on and after April 27, 1861; therefore captures and destruction of the vessels, &c., of the citizens of the United States by the navy of the Confederate States were lawful. So were seizures and destruction of property of such citizens by the confederate army on land, lawful; and therefore no citizen of the United States had any legal or moral claim against his Government on account of such losses. (See the Prize cases, 2 Black, U. S. S. C., 636, and Vattel's Law of Nations, ch. xv, p. 290; Grotius, book 3, ch. xx, sec. 8, p. 290.)

Great Britain was a neutral nation, friendly with the United States. In May, 1861, Great Britain acknowledged the belligerent character of the Confederate States. From the ports of Great Britain sailed confederate cruisers to prey upon the shipping of the citizens of the United States; the Florida in March, and the Alabama in July, 1862, from Liverpool; the Georgia in April, 1863, from the Clyde, and the Shenandoah in March, 1864, from London. It was said that others of such confederate cruisers found shelter in her harbors, obtained coal, munitions of war, and armaments there, and British subjects to fight the United States.

The United States asserted that these cruisers so acted with the knowledge of Great Britain, and under such circumstances as should have made her prevent such acts; and the United States claimed that that early recognition encouraged, if it did not create, such a navy for the Confederate States. And for this the United States claimed that Great Britain should indemnify her, and that the lowest indemnity she could accept in honor was payment for the property of her citizens so destroyed.

Great Britain denied any liability by reason of anything it had done or omitted to do in the premises. Much correspondence on the subject resulted in the treaty of Washington. So far as is here material it was substantially this:

"ARTICLE 1. Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of her Britannic majesty, and still exist, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the 'Alabama claims;' and whereas her Britannic majesty has authorized her high commissioners and plenipotentiaries to express in a friendly spirit the regret felt by her majesty's government for the escape, under whatever circumstances, of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports, and for the depredations committed by those vessels: Now, in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims, which are not admitted by her Britannic majesty's government, the high contracting parties agree that all the said claims growing out of acts committed by the aforesaid vessels and generically known as the 'Alabama claims,' shall be referred to a tribunal of arbitration, to be composed of five arbitrators, to be appointed in the following manner:"

Articles 2 and 3 provided that this tribunal should "decide all questions that shall be laid before them on the part of the governments" of the United States and Great Britain, and spoke of those governments as the "two parties" to the cause.

Article 6 laid down three rules which, together with the law of nations not inconsistent therewith, should be the standard by which to try whether Great Britain had failed to perform its duty as a neutral friend of the United States. Great Britain did not admit that these rules had been a part of the law of nations, but that they should be so considered for the purposes of this trial, and binding in future between it and the United States and such other powers as they could induce to agree thereto.

It was declared further as follows, (article 7, paragraph 3:)

"The said tribunal shall first determine as to each vessel separately whether Great Britain has by any act or omission failed to fulfill any of the duties set forth in the foregoing three rules or recognized by the principles of international law not inconsistent with such rules, and shall certify such fact as to each of said vessels. In case the tribunal find that Great Britain has failed to fulfill any duty or duties as aforesaid, it may, if it think proper, proceed to award a sum in gross to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for all the claims referred to it; in such case the gross sum so awarded shall be paid in coin by the Government of Great Britain to the Government of the United States, at Washington, within twelve months after the date of the award.

* * * * * * *

"ART. 10. In case the tribunal finds that Great Britain has failed to fulfill any duty or duties as aforesaid, and does not award a sum in gross, the high contracting parties agree that a board of assessors shall be appointed to ascertain and determine what claims are valid, and what amount or amounts shall be paid by Great Britain to the United States on account of the liability arising from such failure, as to each vessel, according to the extent of such liability as decided by the arbitrators."

After providing how this board was to be organized, &c., it was declared that "the decision of the assessors shall be given upon each claim in writing."

* * * * * * *

"Every claim shall be presented" within six months, "but they may for good cause shown extend the time for the presentation of any claim" for three months more. It also provides that the assessors shall report "the amount of claims decided by them" in one year. "If further claims then remain undecided," report again in two years; and "in case any claims remain undetermined" then, make final report in six months.

"All sums of money which may be awarded under this article shall be payable at Washington, in coin, within a year after delivery of each report."

Article 11 provided that the result should be a full, perfect, and final settlement of all the claims hereinbefore referred to, and that all such, whether presented or not should be "treated as finally settled, barred, and thenceforth inadmissible."

This was all of the treaty as to the claims known as the "Alabama claims." It contained other important provisions, but of them later.

As shown by the majority report, there are two principal classes of claimants for this fund. That report has presented the views of one of those classes. We herewith present the views of the other class. Their advocates make this case, namely:

The United States caused its "case" to be prepared by Hon. J. C. Bancroft Davis for presentation to the tribunal. It claimed damages for, first, destruction of vessels and cargoes by the confederate cruisers; second, national expenses of pursuing them; third, for transfer of American commercial marine to the British flag; fourth, for enhanced payments of insurance; and, fifth, for the prolongation of the war. It said:

"The claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes may be further subdivided into: 1. Claims for destruction of vessels and property of the Government of the United States. 2. Claims for the destruction of vessels and property under the flag of the United States. 3. Claims for damages or injuries to persons growing out of the destruction of each class of vessels.

"In the accompanying, volume VII, the tribunal will find ample data for determining the amount of damage which should be awarded in consequence of the injuries inflicted by reason of the destruction of vessels or property, whether of the Government or private persons."

The individual claims were therein presented under this heading:

"LIST OF CLAIMS FOR PROPERTY DESTROYED BY REBEL CRUISERS FITTED OUT IN BRITISH PORTS.

"The following is an abstract of the claims filed in the Department of State by American citizens, native and naturalized, for damages sustained by them as owners, mariners, freighters, or insurers of duly documented American ships captured and destroyed, or appropriated by the officers and crew of the steamer Alabama, and as owners, insurers, or otherwise interested in the cargoes of such ships, or in charter-parties for the service of said ships. The several insurance companies are corporations organized and doing business under the laws of the several States in which they are respectively located." (Appendix, United States claims, volume 4, page 9,422.)

The tribunal met on the 15th of December, 1871. The "case" of the United States, in printed volumes, was presented, and the tribunal adjourned from the 16th of December, 1871, to the 15th of June, 1872.

Meanwhile Great Britain sought to have the United States withdraw its claims for damages on account of the transfer of American commercial marine to the British flag, the additional cost of the war, and enhanced rates of insurance, known now as "war premiums;" but all efforts to modify the case had been ineffectual when the tribunal reassembled in June.

The United States filed its arguments, but Great Britain withheld hers; she denied the jurisdiction of the tribunal over those "indirect losses" just stated, but asked a further postponement to obtain a modification of the treaty, or other arrangements to avoid action upon such claims for damages.

At that point in the case the tribunal announced the following opinion:

"After the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations, and should, upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there were no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon." (Papers relating to treaty of Washington, volume 4, page 20.)

A copy of this opinion was sent to Mr. Fish, United States Secretary of State, and he replied to our agent, Mr. Davis, as follows:

"That in accordance with such judgment and opinion, from henceforth he (the President) regards the claims set forth in the case presented on the part of the United States for loss in the transfer of the American marine to the British flag, the enhanced payment of insurance and the prolongation of the war and the suppression of the rebellion, as adjudicated and disposed of, and that consequently they will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, but are henceforth excluded from its consideration by the tribunal in making up its award." (Correspondence, 152.)

Then the tribunal was informed by Mr. Davis that:

"The declaration made by the tribunal, individually and collectively, respecting the claims presented by the United States for the award of the tribunal for, first, the losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag; second, the enhanced payments of insurance; and third, the prolongation of the war and the suppression of the rebellion, is accepted by the President of the United States as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law involved. The agent of the United States is authorized to say that, consequently, the above-mentioned claims will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration in any award that may be made." (Protocol, vi, page 21, volume 4, Geneva Arbitration.)

And thereupon, at the request of the counsel of Great Britain, the tribunal entered in the proceedings a formal order that said claims "are and from henceforth shall be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal." (Papers relating to treaty of Washington, volume 4, page 21.)

The cause proceeded. The tribunal decided that Great Britain was not guilty of wrong according to the standard established in the treaty, except as to the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah and their tenders, and as to the Shenandoah, only after she left Melbourne. (Hence they are called the "inculpated cruisers.") It decided that Great Britain was not guilty as to the other six or seven cruisers. (Hence they are called the exculpated cruisers.) It further decided that:

"Whereas, so far as relates to the particulars of the indemnity claimed by the United States, the costs of pursuit of the confederate cruisers are not, in the judgment of the tribunal, properly distinguishable from the general expenses of the war carried on by the United States, the tribunal is therefore of opinion, by a majority of three voices to two, that there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head." (See Decision and Award, volume 4, page 53.)

"And whereas prospective earnings cannot properly be made the subject of compensation, inasmuch as they depend in their nature upon future and uncertain contingencies, the tribunal is unanimously of opinion that there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head." (Ib., 53.)

Nothing remained but to find the damages for the direct losses. Counsel for each side presented tables of evidence and estimates. These estimates, by the United States counsel submitted, aggregated $14,437,143.51; those submitted by the British counsel aggregated but $7,464,764. The tribunal decided to find a sum in gross instead of sending the case to assessors as might have been done under the tenth article of the treaty, and concluded as follows:

"And whereas, in order to arrive at an equitable compensation for the damages which have been sustained, it is necessary to set aside all double claims for the same losses, and all claims for 'gross freights' as far as they exceed 'net freights.'

"And whereas, it is just and reasonable to allow interest at reasonable rate; and whereas, in accordance with the spirit and the letter of the treaty of Washington, it is preferable to adopt the form of adjudication of a sum in gross, rather than to refer the subject of compensation for further discussion and deliberation to a board of assessors as provided by article 10 of said treaty:

"The tribunal, making use of the authority conferred by Article VII of the said treaty, by a majority of four voices to one, award to the United States the sum of $15,500,000 in gold as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal conformably to the provisions contained in Article VII of the aforesaid treaty.

"And in accordance with the terms of Article XI of the said treaty, the tribunal declares that all the claims referred to in the treaty or submitted to the tribunal are hereby fully, perfectly, and finally settled.

"Furthermore, it declares that each and every of said claims, whether the same may or may not have been presented to the notice of, made, preferred, or laid before the tribunal, shall henceforth be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and inadmissible."

This judgment was signed and dated the 14th of September, 1872.

Great Britain paid the $15,500,000 on the 9th of September, 1873, to the United States.

Upon that record this class of claimants proceed with their argument practically on this wise:

The "differences" between the two governments were stated in the instructions of the Secretary of State of the United States to its minister in England, to be, first, "indemnities which he (the President) thinks due by Great Britain to individual citizens of the United States for the destruction of their property by rebel cruisers fitted out in the ports of Great Britain;" second, "the vast national injuries it has inflicted on the United States. How these were caused and what is the law are reserved till time arrives when" the President will consider with sincere and earnest desire that all differences between the two nations may be adjusted. * * * This was dated 25th September, 1869.

Or to go further back, in September, 1862, upon the first wrong by these cruisers the United States caused notice to be served upon Great Britain to accomplish, as was stated therein—

"Two important objects, first, redress for the national and private injuries sustained; and secondly, a prevention of such lawless and injurious proceedings hereafter." (Claims of the United States against Great Britain, vol. 3, pp. 57–70–73.)

In January, 1863, the New York Mutual Insurance Company had presented to the Secretary of State of the United States its claim of damage by the destruction by the Alabama of the Brilliant, which it had insured and on which it paid the owner for a total loss. And notice of this was served as the former, (Ib., pp. 118, 120.) From time to time other claims were filed by various persons.

The treaty was made on the 8th of May, 1871, ratified by the Senate on the 8th of June, 1871, and proclaimed by the President on the 4th of July, 1871.

In September, 1871, the Secretary of State issued a circular letter as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September —, 1871.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the —— instant, and its inclosures. In reply I inclose a copy of the treaty concluded with Great Britain on the 8th of May last, and general instructions as to the proof of claims prepared for the use of claimants in the absence of rules by the tribunal which may pass upon the claims.

In the absence of rules, and in anticipation of the action of the tribunal, this Department cannot assume to determine what claims it may or may not be proper to prefer under the first eleven articles of the treaty, nor to direct what form or extent of proof will be necessary to establish them, nor the effect of insurance upon the question of right of compensation. It will present to the tribunal at Geneva, to be taken into account in estimating the sum to be paid the United States, all "claims growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the Alabama claims," which may be presented to the Department in time to enable it to do so. Persons desiring to lodge claims in the Department for that purpose are requested to do so without delay, in such form and sustained by such proofs as they may be advised or think proper to rest their claims upon, as the time for presenting the case of the United States expires on the 16th day of December next.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant

HAMILTON FISH, Secretary.

The heading under which the private claims were listed and presented to the tribunal is already shown. These private claims so presented embraced claims for damages to owners, freighters, and insurers of vessels and cargoes captured or destroyed, and of sailors, &c., for loss of wages and personal injuries by the confederate forces on the confederate cruisers, and they say that they embraced no other claims. (Claims of United States against Great Britain, volume 4, page 422.)

But before the treaty was concluded in January, 1871, and afterward they say claims for enhanced insurance (or "war premiums") were presented and went into the pleadings and proof called "the case" submitted to the tribunal.

They say that no evidence was offered to the tribunal as to the personal injuries, nor for loss by transfer of commercial marine to the British flag, prolongation of the war, &c. (Papers relating to treaty of Washington, volume 1, page 187.)

They claim that were this record between individuals none could hesitate as to a conclusion; that all claims for damages by the United States as a government were held to be bad; that all "prospective profits" and all enhanced insurance ("war premiums") and all damages by "exculpated cruisers," including the Shenandoah before Melbourne, were rejected, and that the sole inquiry then was, What is the measure of damages for the claims not thus set at rest?

They note the argument that that view is not applicable between nations, because it treats them as trustees of their subjects or citizens, in such cases, and the use made by the majority of Rustomjee vs. The Queen, decided in 1876. They say China had paid Great Britain under treaty of 1842 $3,000,000, because insolvent Chinese merchants owed very large sums of money to subjects of her Britannic majesty. Parliament had made no provision for its distribution, and Rustomjee undertook to enforce payment of what he said was his share of it by petition of right, though it does not appear that his claim was fixed or acted upon.

The decision was, "in such a case a petition of right will not lie." Mr. Justice Cockburn said the Government could not be treated in such cases as an agent or trustee for the subject; but, as if doubting the correctness of the remark when applied to duty instead of legal liability, added, "at all events, I think the petition of right will not lie." * * *

Justice Blackburn said:

"I do not think that it can possibly be said that where the Queen has as a high act of state made a treaty and received money in consequence of an act of state the mode of distribution is in any way enforcible by a court of law or subject to the findings of juries. I think there is a moral claim that it be given to the right person, which must be investigated in the manner in which her majesty is pleased to direct." * * *

Lush, justice, said:

"No doubt a duty arose as soon as the money was received to distribute that money among the persons toward whose losses it was paid by the Emperor of China." * * *

And Lord Coleridge, in delivering the opinion of the reviewing court, affirmed the judgment, but said:

"We do not say that under no circumstances can the Crown be a trustee; we do not even say that under no circumstances can the Crown be an agent; but it seems clear to us that in all that relates to the making and performance of a treaty with another sovereign the Crown is not, and cannot be, either a trustee or an agent for any subject whatever.

"We do not, indeed, doubt that on the payment of the money by the Emperor of China there was a duty on the part of the English sovereign to administer the money so received according to the stipulations of the treaty; but it was a duty to do justice to her subjects according to the advice of her responsible minister, not the duty of an agent to a principal, or of a trustee to a cestui que trust."

They do not pretend that any one can force the United States to pay him part of this fund. All that is claimed is that it ought to pay them. The plain, practical, honest view, they claim, was forcibly presented by Mr. Cushing in his letter published in the Journal of Commerce on November 12, 1872, but dated October 17, 1872, before these antagonisms had developed. After drawing a distinction between these claims and those for French spoliations, he said:

"In the case of the 'Alabama claims,' however, the United States will have in their hands a definite sum of money, awarded against England by the tribunal of arbitration, and paid over by England to the United States for distribution among the parties interested, according to the award of the tribunal.

"2. In the matter of the 'Alabama claims,' the agent and counsel of the United States presented to the tribunal detailed schedules and estimates of the claims of American citizens on account of captures by confederate cruisers fitted out in or dispatched from ports of Great Britain in violation of public law; setting forth the names of vessels captured and the names of parties interested—whether owners of ship, freight or cargo, or officers and seamen or insurers—and asserting the responsibility of Great Britain in the premises.

"The tribunal, in the first place, adjudged Great Britain to be guilty in respect of all captures made by the Alabama and the Florida, and their tenders, and by the Shenandoah after her departure from Melbourne.

"The tribunal, in the second place, examined and scrutinized the schedules and estimates of individual losses presented by the United States, and on the inspection thereof awarded a sum in gross which they conceived to be sufficient (and which I think is sufficient) to afford a just indemnity to the injured citizens of the United States.

"This gross sum will, within the year, be paid by Great Britain to the United States with interest on any delay; it will be received and held by the United States as a trust fund to be distributed among the parties interested, conformably to the tenor and spirit of the award of the tribunal; and the Government will be bound to make such distribution promptly and justly, by the moral force of its duty in good faith to England and its obligation to fulfill the stipulations of the treaty of Washington.

"There is no contingency, uncertainty, or doubt in all this; you and the other parties in interest may, I do not hesitate to say, rest assured of the honor and good faith of the Government of the United States in this respect with just as much of certitude as in the payment of the gold bonds of the Government.

"3. It is for Congress to decide as to the manner of effecting the distribution of this money among the parties interested. We may reasonably conjecture, however, that a board of assessors will be appointed to receive and examine the individual claims upon evidence and to estimate the amount of each, and the amount to be paid to the respective claimants. The most important duty of this board will be the valuation of property and the determination of questions of ownership."

This opinion, they say, was based upon well-known principles frequently announced by Story and Kent, among the dead, and then but lately repeated in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Anderson and Padelford cases, in Wallace's Reports, decided 1869. In the former, Judge Davis delivered the opinion of the court and therein used this language, namely:

"In a spirit of liberality it (Congress) constituted the Government a trustee for so much of this property as belonged to the faithful Southern people." * * * (9 Wall. R., 65.)

In the latter, Chase, C. J., delivering the opinion, used this language, namely:

"Under the proclamation and the act, the Government is a trustee holding the proceeds of the petitioner's property for her benefit." (9 Wallace, 543.)

They claim that the United States treated the money as the property of others when she funded it at 5 per cent. interest in her own bonds for their benefit, by act of 3d March, 1873, (S. L.,) and that she so treated it by the act of 1874, under which it was partially distributed.

When the report of the majority says the United States cannot in good conscience keep it, and yet argues that she is not a trustee for those who should have the fund, they say that the statement is a conclusive answer to their views.

As to collection of a gross sum, they say that that was not to cover a national injury, in the sense of putting money into the United States Treasury, but was only to enable the United States to pay sooner and more to her satisfaction to her citizens; that the language of the United States was:

"They earnestly hope that the tribunal will exercise the power conferred upon it to award a sum in gross to be paid by Great Britain to the United States. The injuries of which the United States complain were committed many years since. The original wrongs to the sufferers by the acts of the insurgent cruisers have been increased by the delay in making reparation. It will be unjust to impose further delay and the expense of presenting claims to another tribunal, if the evidence which the United States have the honor to present for the consideration of these arbitrators shall prove to be sufficient to enable them to determine what sum in gross would be a just compensation to the United States for the injuries and losses of which they complain." (See American case, p. 480.)

Attention has been called to the Johnson-Clarendon convention concluded in January, 1869, and to the fact that Senator Sumner attacked it because, as he said:

"England simply proposes to submit the question of liability for 'individual losses' to an anomalous tribunal where chance plays its part. This is all. Nothing is admitted even on this question; no rule for the future is established; while nothing is said of the indignity to the nation, nor of the damages to the nation." (Ib., volume 5, page 719.)

The Senate rejected that treaty, and perhaps for those reasons; but they say that the remedy was supplied by the treaty of Washington. They say that the United States desired an apology, and obtained it in the expression of "the regret by her majesty's government for the escape, under whatever circumstances, of the Alabama and other vessels from British ports, and for the depredations committed by those vessels." (Treaty of Washington, article 1.)

The United States wished—

"A prevention of such lawless and injurious proceedings hereafter; and obtained that in fixing the three rules as to the duty of neutrals as she wished them fixed, as a solemn contract with Great Britain for all time." (Ib.)

The United States had complained at the early recognition of the Confederate States by Great Britain as a belligerent, and the first article of the treaty declared its purpose to be—

"In order to remove and to adjust all complaints and claims on the part of United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims which are not admitted by her Britannic majesty's government." (Ib.)

This apology, this prevention, came with the treaty. That complaint and all other complaints were adjusted by the treaty, not by the trial and award; and nowhere else in the record do we see "complaints," but only "claims." Therefore eo instanti upon the consummation of the treaty, without presenting any claim for money damages for her citizens, they say that she had all she asked as a nation, except money damages for herself. They say that she sought to recover for herself damages for the transfer of American marine to the British flag, additional cost of the war, and the cost of pursuit of the confederate cruisers. They say that she sought to recover for her citizens enhanced insurance (a "war premium") and prospective earnings; but the tribunal rejected all, as it said, because they did "not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such causes, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations; and should, upon such principles, be excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award."

What were the principles? They say not that they were not national and cognizable in a contest between nations. The first class were undoubtedly national and only national. The second class were undoubtedly individual, and only individual. The common principle applicable to both, applicable there and in any court, was that they were damages too remote, speculative, consequential, &c.

As to the usage in like cases the following argument is made:

On the 13th November, 1826, the United States recovered of Great Britain $1,204,960, "in lieu of and in full and complete satisfaction of all sums claimed or claimable from Great Britain by any person or persons under the convention," (of 1822,) and by act of March 2, 1827, ordered a special tribunal "to determine said claims and to award distribution of the said fund among the several claimants according to their respective rights." (U. S. Stat. at L., volume 4, page 219.)

By the treaty between the United States and Denmark, of March 28, 1830, $650,000 were paid to the United States on account of our citizens who had suffered by the ships of Denmark, and it was to be distributed by a board of commissioners who should "receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all such claims, according to the merits of the several cases, and to justice and equity, and the laws, of nations," and they were carried out by act of March 2, 1831. (U. S. Stat. at L., vol. iv, page 446.)

Under the convention of July 4, 1831, with France, she paid the United States 25,000,000 francs to indemnify our citizens for losses by sea, &c., and Congress, by act of July 13, 1832, made a commission to distribute this "gross sum" between them, according to the convention "and the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations." (U. S. Stat. at L., volume v, page 574.)

Under the convention of October 14, 1832, with the Two Sicilies, the United States received 2,115,000 ducats, 7,679 of them for herself, and the balance for her citizens, to be distributed as she pleased, and she ordered it done by a commission according to the provisions of the convention and the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations. (U. S. Stat. at L., vol. v, p. 666.)

The same rule of distribution exactly was provided for the 12,000,000 of reals paid by Spain to the United States in 1834, (U. S. Stat. at L., vol. v, p. 35,) with the $300,000 received from Peru in 1841, (U. S. Stat. at L., vol. ix, p. 80,) with the 700,000 milreis received from Brazil in 1849, (Ib., 422,) and with the $700,000 received from China in 1858, (Ib., vol. vi, p. 408.)

And a like remedy was provided by a supplemental bill to that last cited, and that, too, in favor of insurance companies which had paid for losses by the acts of Chinese, and been thereby subrogated to the rights of owners of the destroyed property. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 6, 1878.)

On the 5th of March, 1878, Mr. CRAPO, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted a report upon the petition of the following mutual insurance companies, to wit, the Sun, the Mercantile, the New York, and the China, for relief in the matter of the bark Caldera and her cargo. That report was unanimous, and stated these facts, namely:

"The bark Caldera, under the command of Mathew Rooney, an American citizen, being laden with a cargo belonging to American merchants, sailed from the port of Hong-Kong on the 5th day of October, 1854, bound to the port of San Francisco; and, having been obliged to seek shelter from a storm in the port of Keolan, on the Chinese coast, was, while at anchor there and the crew employed at the pumps to keep the vessel free of water, boarded by armed bands of Chinese, who drove the men from the pumps, took possession of the vessel, and, after plundering her of all the cargo except granite in the lower hold, burned her, and she became a total loss.

"The petitioning insurance companies paid insurance to the amount of $72,512, being a total loss of the whole sum insured, besides a considerable sum in addition, expended in an unsuccessful effort to recover the property.

"The petitioners took all the necessary steps to establish a valid claim on the Chinese Government for the amount of the loss, and Mr. Marcy, then Secretary of State, in a dispatch to Dr. Parker, fully recognized the justice of the claim and directed its prosecution before the Chinese Government.

"In 1858 Mr. Reed, the then American minister, made a convention with the Chinese Government, securing indemnity for this as well as other claims, and about $700,000 was paid by the Chinese Government, a large portion of which is still held by the State Department awaiting the disposition of Congress.

"Mr. Reed recommended that the claim of the Caldera should be adjudicated at home, because the evidence could be there most easily produced. Meanwhile, under an act of Congress, passed in 1859, commissioners were appointed to pass upon all claims upon this Chinese indemnity fund. These commissioners held their sessions at Macao, in China, and to them the papers in the Caldera case were forwarded by Mr. Cass, then Secretary of State. The claim was duly filed with the commissioners, who made a deduction therefrom of 60 per cent., on the ground of a supposed prior damage by sea-water to the cargo. This deduction appears to have been made without sufficient evidence of its justice, and under a misapprehension of the law applicable to the case, and the claimants had no opportunity of being heard upon the question. They were told that the acceptance of the 40 per cent. allowed them would not preclude a rehearing of the case at Washington; but as the act of 1859 did not provide for an appeal from the decision of the commissioners, such a rehearing cannot be had without an act of Congress.

"Your committee are satisfied, from the evidence submitted to them, that it is but just that the underwriters should be allowed to present the evidence which, if they had time or proper notice, would have been presented to the commissioners, to some competent tribunal for a final decision as to the justice of their claim. Other claims presented to the commission, and which were disallowed by it, have been reviewed and paid from this fund. The case of the Neva, which was of like character to this, was entirely rejected by the commissioners, but the claimants, by act of Congress, were allowed a rehearing before the Attorney-General, who decided that the conclusions of the commissioners were erroneous, and payment was accorded to them. Your committee are of the opinion that the Court of Claims is the tribunal by which questions of this character should be heard and determined."

And they reported a bill according thereto.

The first section of the bill provided that any person or persons, or body corporate, holding and making any claim upon the balance of the fund usually designated and known as the "Chinese indemnity fund," under the control of the Department of State of the United States, and now unappropriated, for losses sustained by the plunder and destruction, in the year 1854, of the bark Caldera, and property on board of said vessel, may, at any time within twelve months after the passage of this act, commence proceedings in the United States Court of Claims against the United States, in the same manner as other suits are brought pursuant to and in virtue of the statutes of the United States and the rules of said court; and that the said Court of Claims shall have full jurisdiction to hear and determine such claim or demand, according to the principles of justice and international law; while the second made provision that either party, plaintiff or defendant, might appeal from the decision or judgment of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner as now provided for in other cases. And this bill, thus unanimously reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, passed the House without a dissenting voice, after full explanation by Mr. CRAPO. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 6, 1878.)

This list of precedents is taken from the majority report of the Judiciary Committee of the Forty-fifth Congress, on this subject, made by Hon. J. PROCTOR KNOTT, then chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives. (Report No. 663, second session Forty-fifth Congress.)

The majority report here tries to draw a distinction by emphasizing the fact that the sums paid in these cases were paid "on account of our citizens," &c.

To that these claimants reply that after all the national claims were eliminated from this case the tribunal awarded a gross sum "to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for all the claims referred to it." (Treaty, Article VII.) Treating that as necessarily meaning valid claims, they claim that there is no difference in principle, and practically none in language.

They further say that in the treaty with Brazil there is a striking likeness on this point; that there, too, questions of peace or war may have entered into the consideration of the high contracting parties, as well as idemnity to citizens. We quote that treaty:

"The United States of America and his majesty the Emperor of Brazil, desiring to remove every cause that might interfere with the good understanding and harmony which now happily exists between them and which it is so much the interest of both countries to maintain, and to come for that purpose to a definite understanding equally just and honorable to each, as to the mode of settling the long-pending questions arising out of claims of citizens of said States, have for the same appointed (officers named) who, after exchanging their full powers, which were found in good and proper form, agreed to the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1. The two high contracting parties, appreciating the difficulty of agreeing upon the subject of said reclamations, from the belief entertained by each, one of the justice of the claims and the other of their injustice, and being convinced that the only equitable and honorable method by which the two countries can arrive at a perfect understanding of said questions is to adjust them by a single act, they mutually agreed, after a mature examination of these claims, and in order to carry this agreement into execution it becomes the duty of Brazil to place at the disposition of the President of the United States the amount of four hundred and thirty thousand millreis, current money of Brazil, as a reasonable and equitable sum, which shall comprehend the whole of the reclamations, whatever may be their nature and amount, and as full compensation for the indemnifications claimed by the Government of said States, to be paid in a round sum, without reference to any one of said claims, upon the merits of which the two high contracting powers refrain from entering; it being left to the Government of the United States to estimate the justice that may pertain to the claimants, for the purpose of distributing among them the aforesaid sum of five hundred and thirty thousand millreis as it may deem most proper."

In all these cases the damages were done at sea; the United States received a gross sum, and none had an enforceable or legal claim to any part of the money. But thus did the United States discharge its moral obligation.

But it has been said that—

"No claimant was permitted to be heard at Geneva, and that the amount was arrived at without permitting contest between the rival claimants and without satisfactory knowledge to the world of what claims were actually embraced in it. * * * There is nothing in the treaty of Washington directing the method of distribution; and it would have been grossly indelicate and extrajudicial in the tribunal of arbitration to have prescribed any rule of action to the sovereign power of the United States." (Minority report, No. 663, second session Forty-fifth Congress.)

And such is the argument of the present report.

The reply of these claimants is that in none of the treaties already cited was there anything "directing the method of distribution." In each of them the amount was fixed without permitting "claimants to be heard," and "without permitting contest between the real claimants," and the world knew not "what claims were actually embraced in" the gross sum received. It was, in each case, only after the money was in the United States Treasury that she permitted rival claimants to be heard, and then not in Congress, but in a court charged to decide "according to the merits of the several cases and the principles of justice, equity, the law of nations, and the stipulation of said convention." (Ante.)

In this very treaty of Washington, they say, was a provision for the adjustment, by a special tribunal, thereby created, of all claims on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, citizens of the United States, upon the government of her Britannic majesty, arising out of acts committed against the persons or property of citizens of the United States during the period between the 13th of April, 1861, and the 9th of April, 1865, inclusive, not being claims growing out of the acts of the vessels referred to in article 1 of this treaty; and all claims, with the like exception, on the part of corporations, companies, or private individuals, subjects of her Britannic majesty upon the Government of the United States, arising out of acts committed against the persons or property of subjects of her Britannic majesty during the same period, which may have been presented to either government for its interposition with the other, and which yet remain unsettled, as well as any other such claims which may be presented within the time specified in article 14 of this treaty. * * * (Article 12.)

And by article 13 it was declared that the commission—

"Shall investigate and decide such claims in such order and such manner as they may think proper, but upon such evidence or information only as shall be furnished by or on behalf of the respective governments. They shall be bound to receive and consider all written documents or statements which may be presented to them by or on behalf of the respective governments in support of or in answer to any claim, and to hear, if required, one person on each side on behalf of each government on each and every separate claim.

* * * * * * *

"It shall be competent for each government to name one person to attend the commission as its agent to attend and support claims on its behalf, and to answer claims made upon it, and to represent it generally in all matters connected with the investigation and decision thereof."

Article 11, as to the Alabama claims, and article 17, as to these claims, were identical. Article 15 declared "all sums of money which shall be awarded by the commissioners on account of any claim shall be paid by the one government to the other, as the case may be." Individual claimants in each case were alike excluded from the tribunals, and even after payment of the funds could not be heard till their government gave audience. That must be so. Claimants can only act in such cases through their governments.

Nor were these claims presented to that mixed commission dissimilar from those passed upon by the other tribunal at Geneva. They were sandwiched in between the Alabama claims and the great issues as to boundaries, navigation of the Saint Lawrence, passage through Maine and Canada, and the fishing interests of the two governments.

Of the claims presented to the commission for adjudication were nineteen in favor of citizens of the United States against Great Britain for sums aggregating about one million dollars. Twelve of them were for damages at Saint Albans, Vermont, in October, 1864; one for injuries to ships and other property of citizens of the United States therein, on Lake Erie, in September, 1864—all alleged to have been done by confederate soldiers—and four for detention of vessels at Calcutta in 1862. These were all disallowed.

The subjects of Great Britain presented their four hundred and seventy-eight claims against the United States, aggregating, in principal and interest, nearly $100,000,000. Two hundred and fifty-nine of them were for property of British subjects alleged to have been taken by the Army, Navy, and civil authorities of the United States, and used by the United States; one hundred and eighty-seven of them were for destruction of like property by our Army and Navy; seven were for destruction of like property by confederate soldiers; one hundred for unlawful arrests of British subjects by the United States; seventy-seven for capture of British vessels, &c., as prize of war, by United States forces; and three for unlawfully warning British vessels away in the absence of an effective blockade of the Southern coasts. Thirty were dismissed for want of jurisdiction; two hundred and fifty-eight were disallowed on the merits; eight were withdrawn by the Queen of Great Britain; and in one hundred and eighty-one awards were made in favor of the claimants, respectively, against the United States. The awards aggregated $1,929,819. (Papers relating to treaty of Washington, volume 6, pages 8 and 9.)

Suppose in this case, as in the other, the private claims had been looked into to find the amount of damages, and that it had been allowable to give a gross sum, and that had been done. Upon the logic of the majority, Great Britain might have well said, "Your claims were used to shape findings upon great national questions of boundary, navigation, and the like, and we will exclude some of you and prefer others in distributing the fund." Such a thing, these claimants contend, would have been impossible in a government accustomed to do justice to its citizens; that claimants would have had no "writ of right," but would not have been so treated.

Much stress has been laid upon the fact that, after the treaty was made, Secretary Fish in his instructions to Mr. Cushing, our counsel, (dated 8th December, 1871,) urged him not to "commit the Government to the disposition of what may be awarded or what may be recovered in the event of the appointment of the board of assessors mentioned in the tenth article of the treaty." They say it is plain, from the three next sentences, that he wished only to keep open the question as between owners and insurers of the same property where both claimed, making the "double claims" spoken of by the tribunal, and in which it rejected all doubling. Those sentences are:

"It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the right and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution."

They also insist that there is a conclusive answer to this, namely:

"A treaty is the supreme law of the land; it can neither be limited nor restricted, nor modified, nor altered. It stands on the ground of national contract, and is declared by the Constitution to be the supreme law of the land, and this gives it a character higher than any act of ordinary legislation."—Mr. Webster, in Senate report 93, first session Thirty-sixth Congress.

They contend that no utterances, however formal or solemn, of officers or counsel, however high, could change this law; all antecedent contentions and contemporaneous suggestions were merged in this writing. It fixed the legal obligations between the United States and Great Britain and the moral obligation of the United States to its citizens, whose claims it represented and whose moral right to the fund recovered is fixed by that record.

They admit that this view would deny the claimants of damages by reason of acts of "exculpated cruisers" and of the Shenandoah "before Melbourne" and the "war-premium" claimants any part of this fund, and would give it to the insurance companies, some of which, counting all their war risks, it is alleged, made money by the acts of these cruisers.

Nor can these claimants perceive any principle which compels a scrutiny of the business of such a company to find a balance between its war losses and war gains before its part (if it have a part) of that fund can be allotted. Who, they ask, applies such a rule to the merchant who lost a cargo by the Alabama, but gained the value of many cargoes by mercantile ventures by sea during the war?

The minority know not whether all these facts are sustainable. They come from many volumes of books which they have not time to scrutinize. Nor will the minority undertake to decide which is right as to the law, the majority or these claimants. But the circumstances that there is room for controversy about facts and a plain disagreement about the law, and that many members in the House and Senate have formerly held with each side, satisfy the minority of the committee that our conclusion in this matter is correct.

The minority are unwilling to pass unnoticed the position of the majority of the committee that the United States is estopped from denying the correctness and justice of any of these claims of either side because the United States presented them to Great Britain, and by her agents and officers said they were good.

Look at it. Citizens of the United States complained that Great Britain had injured them. They had no redress. The petition of right, though available to them as to British subjects, would not lie to try such a question. They asked our Government to assert their rights even at the hazard of war. Having matters of its own to adjust with Great Britain, it added these thereto and submitted all to an honest tribunal, and pledged itself to abide the issue. What more could any citizen ask? The right of each man to recover depended upon showing Great Britain at fault. The United States believed that it was at fault; so said, and tried to prove it. But the verdict was, "not guilty" as to the acts by which the losses of present claimants came about. If a nation binds itself to pay claims by simply saying for its citizens that they are just, it will make nations very chary of asserting rights for their citizens. The doctrine would be dangerous but for the fact that it has no foundation in law or morals.

It is said, however, that the United States used these claims to obtain valuable results for itself, first by their presentation and then by their abandonment. None would believe a charge so injurious to the good character of our country, unless upon compulsory proof. We demand the proof. The facts are exactly and pointedly the reverse. While Great Britain desired to recede, we insisted even when rupture and consequent war were imminent. The United States withdrew nothing. The tribunal decided against her, and "consequently" she insisted no longer; neither right nor decency would have permitted longer contention.

But were both things true, (it is impossible that either could be true,) the insurance companies claim that that would only make the United States owe those deluded and cheated claimants a duty, and perhaps their losses would be its measure, but honesty would require that she should not discharge it out of money collected for others.

We are not unmindful of the legislative history of the efforts to pay out this fund. Both the House and Senate passed bills in February, 1873. They included none as rightful participants but those suffering losses by the "inculpated cruisers," and confined insurance companies to net loss on all their war premiums. Losses by "exculpated cruisers" and the Shenandoah before Melbourne were expressly excluded. But the Houses disagreed and funded the money as before stated.

In May, 1874, the Senate passed substantially its bill of 1873; the House amended by adding losses by exculpated cruisers and war premiums; a conference produced the act of June 23, 1874. (United States Statutes at Large, page —.) It was then thought that such losses as it allowed would exhaust the fund. Under that act the court of commissioners of Alabama claims was organized, and by act of Congress its existence was continued till the 23d of July, 1876. It distributed $9,316,120. In 1876 the House passed a bill to revive the court and let claimants for acts of exculpated cruisers and war premiums be paid. A motion to let in insurance companies for their full losses failed. The Senate did not act upon the matter.

We do not discuss the votes or arguments upon the various propositions, because they decide nothing. Upon such questions the great body of the House and Senate must vote without a full understanding of the facts or law of the case. They have not time to examine the one or the other, nor can we know the reasons which influenced any vote. Local considerations, partiality for friends, and many other considerations enter into such votes. These very differences enforce the conclusion of the minority.

We had thought that "the judicial power (all the judicial power) of the United States" was by the Constitution vested "in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time establish and ordain." That Congress must frequently decide facts, to legislate, we knew, but that it is a "court," the "tribunal of the largest jurisdiction known to the Constitution," as declared by the majority report, is so new to us that we ask to see that part of the Constitution which confers such character upon Congress.

This is but an effort to satisfy that honest disposition to remit all disputants to the court, by misnaming Congress "a court."

We like not that, nor are we pleased with the special tribunal. Why take from this fund the expenses for a new tribunal when we have all needed machinery for doing the work?

Upon this point we adopt the language of the majority report in the Forty-fifth Congress, already cited.

It quoted first the language of Mr. Butler, chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Forty-third Congress, as follows:

"The only antagonism of which your committee is aware to having the distribution of this fund settled by a suit in a single court, with the proper claimants made parties, comes from those who desire that a commission should be established, to sit in Washington, to adjudicate this matter. To this proposition your committee have most decided objections. Here are over fifteen millions of dollars to be divided among certain claimants, who are urging their claims with all the zeal that private interests and large sums at stake can command, and it is well known that all Government claims of this description are generally taken in hand by a class of men known as claim-agents, some of whom are admitted to the bar and some not, under no responsibility whatever to the commission, itself temporary, which can have no control over them or the propriety of their action, and, if they wrong either the clients or the Government, can administer no rebuke or punishment to them; who carry on this business of advocating claims upon the Government generally upon contingent fees and large percentages, the average of which is not lower, so far as your committee can learn, than 25 per cent.; and as the possibility of obtaining any reward for their services depends upon success, a quarter of this fund—with the accrued interest, nearly five millions—the amount of these fees which may or may not be realized, according as the commission can or cannot be moved in favor of the claimants, stands as a fund ready to be used by corrupt men to carry their purposes. * * *

"Your committee do not believe it is wise to expose officers quasi-judicial to such great temptation, and to put it in the power of interested parties to obtain claims against the Government through such great inducements as might be used under these circumstances. The prayer 'lead us not into temptation' has been ordained as necessary for the daily use and guidance of all Christian men for more than eighteen hundred years.

"Besides, the adjudications of this commission are necessarily final, as it is no part of the judicial system of the United States; so that your committee do not see how any appeal can be taken to the Supreme Court. Further, if this commission once gets itself established there is great danger, by referring claims to it on other subject-matter, that it may be continued indefinitely, to say nothing of the very considerable expenses which would attend it, amounting to some fifty to one hundred thousand dollars, even if the Government could get five men fit to do this work, together with the other expenses, for that sum. Nor does your committee think it wise thus to add to the number of office-holders under the Government if its work can be done by the ordinary judicial machinery, which no one doubts. The record of commissions in matters of claims, as against governments, has not always been so bright and clear as to make it certain that the interest of the Government will be safe as against individual greed, while the United States can say with pride that the integrity of her highest judicial officers has never been questioned, and that of the lower very rarely, and as yet never proven.

"On the contrary, if these claims are brought before a court they must be advocated by members of its bar, who will be held responsible to the court for their action, and every adjudication must be made in open day, publishing to the world the grounds and reasons of it, and subject to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, as in other cases."

This quotation is so forcible that we are not surprised that it is mentioned in the minority report. The action of a commission which passed upon claims but little contested does not answer the argument. The Knott report then proceeded:

"Your committee concluded, therefore, without expressing any opinion of their own in relation to the merits of any particular claim or class of claims to the unexpended balance of this fund, that it would be better as a precedent for future cases, better for the Government, and better for all parties claiming to have an equitable interest in it, to commit the adjudication and determination of all questions touching its distribution to the Court of Claims in the first instance, with the right in any party aggrieved to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, with authority to render a judgment in favor of each claimant who was an actual sufferer by the violation of the laws of neutrality by Great Britain, for such an amount as in the opinion of the court he may be justly entitled to under the treaty and award, according to the principles of justice, equity, and the laws of nations, leaving the court untrammeled by any principle of allowance, exclusion, or distribution adopted in chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress or by the tribunal created by that law. This seems to your committee pre-eminently just and fair, and surely no one who claims to have any right to any portion of this fund can object to having his claim thus adjudicated, especially as provision is made in the bill for the speediest possible determination of all disputed principles of law by the Supreme Court, unless he is afraid of justice.

"It may be urged, however, that the provision requiring the Supreme Court to advance appeals in these cases will be a hardship to other suitors whose causes, even as the docket now stands, cannot be reached for perhaps two or three years; but while this may be true to a certain extent, the objection will be found to be more specious than real when it is remembered that all the claims to this fund are embraced in a very few classes, and that all the legal principles about which there can be any dispute will be presented and settled in perhaps one and certainly not over three or four cases on appeal, involving probably not over a week's delay in the ordinary business of the court, if that."

We add that we think it is very important; that a decision of our highest judicial tribunal (not Congress, but the Supreme Court of the United States) upon these questions will be of great value to our citizens and the country.

We conclude with the language of the majority report of the Judiciary Committee of the Forty-fifth Congress, already quoted from, namely:

"We are therefore of the opinion that it would not only be wise and just, but far more in harmony with the genius of our Government, to remove all these disputed questions of private right from the arena of legislation, where the judgment may be biased by local interests and personal prejudice, or obscured by the heat and confusion of debate, and where the machinery is too cumbrous and complicated, the time too limited, the opportunity for investigation too restricted, and the variety of business too great, for the proper administration of distributive justice, to a forum where the rights of all parties claiming an interest in this fund can be deliberately adjudicated and determined by an impartial and dispassionate tribunal, 'according to the principles of justice, equity, and the laws of nations.'"

We accordingly recommend the passage of the bill herewith submitted as a substitute for all the bills on the subject which have been referred to this committee.

N. J. HAMMOND.
J. PROCTOR KNOTT.
EDWIN WILLITS.
D. B. CULBERSON.
VAN H MANNING.

Mr. REED. I had reserved for myself fifteen minutes in which to reply to the arguments which might be made on the other side, but I am happy to say that I shall not have to use all of that time.

I shall confine myself to a statement of the case in a few minutes, and a reply to one or two objections which have been presented against the bill of the majority, and then I shall ask the judgment of the House upon that bill.

In the first place, I claim that at the time the treaty of Washington was started this set of claims, as individual claims, had ceased to exist. The proceeding had become a national proceeding. It was in the nature of an exaction of a fine from Great Britain for the injuries which she had inflicted upon our commerce. The way in which that fine was calculated was simply by a statement in detail of the damages which she had done us. Whatever evidence was presented before the tribunal at Geneva was presented for the purpose of stating the amount of the fine, and when that was done it ceased to have any function whatever. When we commenced to distribute the award we had nothing to do with the evidence which had been submitted to another tribunal—only the evidence that was submitted to us.

My friend from Ohio, [Mr. CONVERSE,] in the careful and able speech which he made upon this subject yesterday, told you an important and controlling fact, which is a reply to everything which has been said upon the other side, from beginning to end. He said that the court of Alabama claims had paid more than two hundred claims that never were presented in any form to the Geneva tribunal. What then becomes of your statement that the Geneva tribunal decided individual claims? Those statements have all gone to the winds.

I add to that statement of the gentleman from Ohio, that the decision of the commissioners of Alabama claims, acting under the law passed to distribute a part of this award, has determined every principle for which I contend in this bill. They paid to the men who lost their property not only the value of the property lost but their war premiums. They paid to the insurance companies every dollar which they had lost, including the war premiums which the insurance companies paid when they made reinsurance.

Now, I say this has been settled, that this award is in the nature of a fine imposed upon Great Britain for the injury which she did our commerce. What shall we do with the money? Distribute it to the people engaged in commercial pursuits who were injured by that act of Great Britain, by her permitting confederate cruisers to be fitted out in her dock-yards and allowing them to be coaled and refitted in the ports of her colonies.

The first set of men, those who were injured by the inculpated cruisers, have been paid. The insurance companies have been paid every dollar which they lost. And now the question comes up on the payment of those who were injured by the exculpated cruisers, amounting to about $1,200,000; and next the payment of the men whose money is now in that fund, because the Government did not pay the ship-owner when he got his insurance, for that would be paying him twice; and it did not pay the insurance companies for the same reason, because they have already got their money.

It is now proposed to pay the war-premium men who actually suffered. But gentlemen say that the war-premium men added those premiums to the cost of their goods. Now, I say that men who make such a declaration as that do not understand mercantile principles. If a man was engaged in the Calcutta trade like my friend from Boston who sits behind me, [Mr. CANDLER,] he knew that if he put his goods in American bottoms he would be obliged to compete with another man who put his goods in British bottoms, and that the British bottom would not have to pay the war premium, while the American bottom would have to pay it. More than that: inasmuch as he wanted his goods transported he was likely to put them in a British bottom, because such a bottom would carry them to the port of their destination, while the American bottom would likely be captured by confederate cruisers. Can anything be clearer than that difference between the two transactions?

But my friend from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] says, "Let us leave this matter to a court." What kind of a court, and to be decided how? "To the Court of Claims, to be decided upon principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations." Now, that sounds pretty, does it not? According to what principles of justice would it be decided? The insurance companies have ransacked the ten thousand books of law reports and have never been able to find one case like this. Where is your principle of justice, then, in the law books? They have ransacked every volume published by the courts of equity and cannot find one case like this. Where is your principle of equity then?

"Oh," they say, "let the court decide it according to the law of nations." What? A distribution of money among our own citizens to be governed by the law of nations? What has the law of nations to do with the Calcutta trade in Boston or with the coastwise trade in California? It is a good mouth-filling phrase, but it does not mean business.

And that is what my friend from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] admits, for he says—"If nobody is entitled to it, then we can take it back and keep it in the Treasury." Yes, we could do that and have the contempt of every nation on the face of the earth. This talk of paying it back to England is more foolish and as wicked as the other.

That idea of paying it back cost us five million and a half of dollars in the Halifax award. Some men cannot understand that a difficult decision may be an honest decision. It is true we found it hard work to decide this case, but that does not prove that it cannot be decided. There have been a great many cases in which there have been hung juries, but in which juries have become at last unanimous on account of having more innate sense. So it will be with Congress. This thing will pass as surely as you live.

Gentlemen say various other conventions have provided for distributing money in the way that the minority of the committee propose. Why, sir, every convention referred to was for individual claims; and I am surprised at the moral courage which the gentleman from Georgia exhibits in getting up here and talking about those old conventions, every one of which is explained in the majority report, and shown to be totally and absolutely unlike this.

My friend from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] has found great difficulty in understanding a figure of speech which I used in regard to Congress being a tribunal. He says Congress has not as large jurisdiction as the Supreme Court. Has it not? Then why does not the Supreme Court transact all the business of this country? What is this Congress here for? To decide individual rights—sometimes by general laws, sometimes by particular laws. What are all human institutions of government for? To decide individual rights. That is what the man meant who said that the whole business of government was to get twelve men into a jury-box.

Why is it that Congress is a greater tribunal than the Supreme Court? Because Congress has discretion in the legal sense, and the Supreme Court has not; because Congress can do things which are outside the province of the Supreme Court; because every day people apply to us to do things which the technical rules of law will not permit to be done by the courts, but which justice demands shall be done. People talk as if courts had power and jurisdiction to dispose of everything. I would like to know what the Supreme Court would do with the Ute reservation if that matter were referred to them. I would like to see the Supreme Court wrestling with that question. We can dispose of it—why? Because we have a wider jurisdiction than the Supreme Court; because we can make law. The Supreme Court can only interpret law; and it cannot interpret laws that do not exist. It cannot interpret and apply laws to a case the like of which never was before and never will be again. But we can. That is the reason why we are a greater tribunal than the Supreme Court. That is why we are more capable of disposing of this case than is that court. I commend my friend from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS] to a careful repersual of his speech, studded as it is with quotations from the report of the majority of the committee, and after he has looked over it all I think he will find that the only sound sense is in the extracts he has made from that report.

This is not a question of decision; it is a question of legislation. It is a question that is to be determined by sound common sense. You have to weigh one consideration against another, and decide what on the whole is best. Do not let us make a sectional decision. I say to gentlemen of the South—and as the sectional argument was used by a Democrat on this floor it is not improper for me to refer to it—I say to gentlemen of the South, it is not like your high-minded character to cause this damage and then to try to put part of the proceeds in your own pockets, for that is what keeping it in the Treasury means.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is not his proposition that the persons to whom he proposes to make payment have no title whatever to this money, but that Congress has the power and the right to give them a title—to legislate a title into men who have none now? Is not that the gentleman's ground?

Mr. REED. Now, is it not perfectly astounding that the gentleman should misunderstand me? I could understand how an insurance company might not comprehend my proposition; but I must say that I am surprised that my intelligent friend from Georgia cannot do so. The Congress of the United States (and here is just where it differs from a court) is moved by something besides the question of legal rights. It is moved by moral and legislative considerations. I propose that we shall exercise the moral power of Congress to save this country from dishonor. So long as this money remains undistributed some men will always think that we have stolen something; but I say it behooves us, in due regard for the national honor, to do our duty, to respond to our moral obligations, and to distribute this money to the persons who were really injured. I now call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question first recurs on the substitute moved by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HAMMOND.]

The substitute is as follows:

A bill to provide for the further distribution of the moneys under the Geneva award.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all persons and corporations claiming any portions of the moneys now under the control of the United States which were received from the Government of Great Britain in payment of the Geneva award, or as interest thereon, be, and they are hereby, authorized to sue for the same in the United States Court of Claims, at any time within one year from the passage of this act, in the same manner in which other claims are sued in said court; and the said court shall render judgment for each claimant for such amount only as, in their opinion, he shall be justly entitled to recover under said treaty and award according to the principles of justice, equity, and the law of nations, but all payments heretofore made on any claim by the United States shall be deducted from the judgment to be rendered thereon.

SEC. 2. That in determining the amount for which judgment is to be rendered in favor of any claimant, interest shall be allowed at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum upon the amount of such claim from the date when the court shall in each case decide that the loss out of which the claim arose was sustained by the claimant; but in entering the judgment the amount of principal and interest shall be stated separately.

SEC. 3. That such persons and corporations or the United States may respectively appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from judgments of the Court of Claims rendered under this act, and such appeals shall be in the form now prescribed by law.

SEC. 4. That all judgments in favor of claimants under this act not appealed from or affirmed on appeal shall be paid out of the aforesaid moneys. Every person or corporation who shall sue under this act shall, within one year from the passage thereof, file with the clerk of the Court of Claims a copy, under oath, of his or their claim, and at the expiration of the said year the clerk of said court shall ascertain the total amount of the money and the interest thereon then under the control of the United States, received from Great Britain in payment of the Geneva award; and thereafter each claimant, at the expiration of ten days after a judgment shall be perfected in his favor, (provided no appeal is taken; and if an appeal is taken, at the expiration of ten days after final judgment in his favor,) shall be entitled to be paid out of the aforesaid moneys the ratable proportion thereof to which he would be entitled if the entire claims so filed were allowed. The remainder of each judgment shall be paid at the expiration of three years from the passage of this act, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the recovery of such judgment; but if the sum of the judgments be greater than the moneys aforesaid, then the remainder of such judgments shall be paid ratably.

SEC. 5. That, if necessary for the dispatch of business under this act, the clerk of the Court of Claims may appoint one or more assistants, and their salaries and all other expenses under this act shall be paid out of the said moneys.

SEC. 6. That no claim which was provable under the acts organizing and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims and was there duly presented, and was there adjudged, shall be provable under this act.

SEC. 7. That claimants under this act shall be admitted to testify in their own behalf.

SEC. 8. That appeals arising under this act shall take precedence of all other cases in the Supreme Court.

SEC. 9. That after the payment of all judgments rendered in pursuance of this act, if there shall remain any part of the said money, the same shall be and remain a special fund to await the further action of Congress.

Mr. HOUSE. I move to lay the bill and substitute on the table.

The question was put, and the Speaker declared the House refused to lay the bill and substitute on the table.

Mr. FROST. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the demand came too late.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I ask for a division on my substitute.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 109.

Mr. HOUSE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, one-fifth of those present not voting in favor thereof.

So the substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. REED. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 133, nays 67, not voting 91; as follows:

TERRITORIAL EXPENSES, ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit herewith for the consideration of Congress a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a copy of a letter from the governor of Arizona, in which he requests that an appropriation of $2,000 be made for the contingent expenses of the Territory for the next fiscal year.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out from said amendment the words "for the orange and lemon, and plants of the citrus family" and insert in lieu thereof the word "horticulture;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the explanation accompanying the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Statements in explanation of conference report on House resolution 4466.

The two Houses disagree upon all the Senate amendments from 1 to 39 inclusive.

The effect of the recommendations of the report, if adopted, will be as follows:

On amendment numbered 1: To increase the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture from $4,000 to $4,500.

On amendments numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6: To make the chief clerk superintendent of the Department building instead of the chief of division of accounts and disbursing clerk, and to add to his salary the sum of $200, and to make the total of the paragraph correspond with the changes agreed to.

On amendments numbered 7 and 8: To fix the salary of the chief chemist at $2,500 in lieu of $3,000, the compensation now paid, and to make the total of the paragraph correspond with the change agreed to.

On amendment numbered 9: To fix the salary of the entomologist at $2,500 in lieu of the compensation now paid, and to make the salary the same as that to be paid to the chief chemist.

On amendments numbered 10 and 11: To increase the salary of the assistant entomologist from $1,200 to $1,400, and to make the total of the paragraph correspond with the changes agreed to.

On amendments numbered 12, 14, and 15: To transfer the "Statistical Division" to another part of the bill, as proposed by the Senate amendments; to change the title of the division to "division of agricultural statistics;" and to increase the salary of the statistician from $2,000 to $2,500 to make the same equal to the salaries proposed to be paid to the chief chemist and the entomologist.

On amendment numbered 13: To strike out the provision relating to the detailed statement of expenditure of amounts appropriated to be made with the Commissioner's annual estimates, the substance of this provision being incorporated in section 2 of the bill.

On amendments numbered 16, 17, and 18: To make the sum for collecting agricultural statistics, &c., $80,000 instead of $75,000, and to make $10,000 thereof immediately available instead of the whole sum as provided in the House bill, and to strike out the provision that no part of the sum appropriated shall be paid to any person receiving at the same time other compensation as an officer or employé of the Government, the substance of this provision being incorporated in section 2 of the bill.

On amendments numbered 19, 20, 21, and 23: To consolidate the appropriations for continuing experiments in the manufacture of sugar from sorghum and beets, and to appropriate $25,000 therefor, instead of $35,000, and to strike out the provisions making the sum immediately available, and allowing the chief chemist $1,000 additional compensation so that the paragraph as recommended will read; as follows:

"For experiments in the manufacture of sugar from sorghum, beets, and other sugar-producing plants, $35,000."

On amendments numbered 25 and 26: To include in the paragraph for investigating the history and habits of insects injurious to agriculture, the Rocky Mountain locust, the cotton-worm, and insects injurious to horticulture, and to make $1,000 of the sum appropriated immediately available.

On amendment numbered 27: To strike out the separate paragraph for investigating the habits, &c., of the Rocky Mountain locust, provision being made therefor in the preceding paragraph.

On amendment numbered 28: To make the sum of $2,000 of the amount appropriated for examination of wools and animal fibers immediately available, instead of the whole sum as provided in the House bill.

On amendments numbered 29, 30, and 31: To strike out, in No. 29, the words "swine, sheep, and other," in No. 30 the words "diseases of swine and sheep," and in No. 31 the word "other;" so that the paragraph will read as follows:

"Investigating the diseases of domesticated animals: For continuing the investigation of infectious and contagious diseases to which all classes of domesticated animals are subject, $25,000."

On amendment numbered 32: To strike out the paragraph appropriating $5,000 for procuring and publishing data respecting the agricultural needs of the country west of the Rocky Mountains.

On amendments numbered 33 and 34: To provide for locating and sinking not exceeding three artesian wells on the plains east of the Rocky Mountains, with a view to reclaiming arid and waste public lands, and appropriating $20,000 for the purpose, and to make the sum of $1,000 provided for in the bill for payment of expenses already incurred immediately available.

On amendments numbered 35 and 36: To increase the amount for the investigation and report upon the subject of forestry from $7,000 to $10,000, and to authorize the Commissioner to experiment upon the subject.

On amendment numbered 37: To make the sum of $2,000 of the amount appropriated for contingent expenses immediately available.

On amendment numbered 38: To appropriate the sum of $2,500 instead of $5,000, as proposed by the Senate amendment, for repairing and resurfacing concrete roads and walks on the grounds.

On amendment numbered 39: To add a new section to the bill, as follows:

"SEC. 2. That no part of the sums herein or hereafter appropriated for the Department of Agriculture shall be paid to any person, as additional salary or compensation, receiving at the same time other compensation as an officer or employé of the Government; and in addition to the proper vouchers and accounts for the sums appropriated for the said Department to be furnished to the accounting officers of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Agriculture shall, at the commencement of each regular session, present to Congress a detailed statement of the expenditures of all appropriations for said Department for the last preceding fiscal year."

Mr. VALENTINE. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman yield to me to ask a question? I observe that there are several items embraced in this conference report in which a change is made by the insertion of the words "to be immediately available." I wish to inquire of my friend from Nebraska why this is done?

Mr. VALENTINE. I will state to the gentleman from Kansas that the Committee on Agriculture having been charged with the preparation of the appropriation bill for that Department, placed these items in the appropriation rather than in the deficiency bill, and these several items to which the gentleman refers are in the light of deficiencies.

Mr. RYAN. They are then to provide for deficiencies?

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. VALENTINE. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman state to the House how many salaries are increased by this report or bill as it now stands if this conference report is adopted, and what is the increase of compensation made to officers of this Department by the bill, as compared to the bill as originally passed by the House?

Mr. VALENTINE. There is no increase of the amount of the bill as it passed the House as now reported by the committee of conference. On the contrary there is a reduction of about twenty-nine thousand dollars, if I recollect correctly. There have been some examinations by the committee as to the salaries of men employed in that bureau, and some have been increased and some diminished. I have no recollection as to whether the difference is seven or twelve hundred dollars, but it is a small amount.

Mr. HOLMAN. How many of the salaries have been reduced and how much?

Mr. VALENTINE. Either two or three, the reduction being $500 in each case.

Mr. HOLMAN. And how many have been increased?

Mr. VALENTINE. Three, I think; and the increase is $500 in two or three cases and $200 in one case.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are two decreased and three increased.

Mr. VALENTINE. Yes, sir; instead of appropriating for some of the scientific bureaus $1,000 out of certain funds to pay the chemist and entomologist, we have stricken that out and simply increased their salaries by $500, thereby saving $500 annually on each of these.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the whole bill there is a reduction of $29,000?

Mr. VALENTINE. I think that is the amount. I move that the House concur in the report.

The report of the committee of conference was concurred in.

Mr. VALENTINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRAPO rose.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me to make a report from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CRAPO. I yield for that purpoee.

DEDUCTIONS FROM GROSS TONNAGE.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 5841) to provide for deductions from the gross tonnage of vessels of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the amendments and accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT DANSKAMMER POINT.

Mr. PAGE also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 5557) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house on the Hudson River at Danskammer Point; and the bill and amendments and accompanying report were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FOG-SIGNAL ON LIME POINT, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PAGE also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6180) for the establishment of a steam fog-signal on Lime Point, San Francisco Harbor, California; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRAPO. I move that the House dispense with the morning hour that we may reach the consideration of the special order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me that I may report a resolution from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CRAPO. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAZELTON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts should prevail would that sweep away private business for the remainder of this day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The dispensing with the morning hour would not affect that.

THE DIGEST.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the resolution which I send to the desk and to ask its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed and bound 250 additional copies of the Digest of the present session for distribution by the journal clerk to committees, to officers of the House, and to heads of Departments and bureaus.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am instructed also by the Committee on Printing to state that it will require only $233 to print these copies. The additional number of copies are demanded for use by the committees. They have no supply of the book.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the resolution be reported again.

Mr. SPRINGER. It provides for only 250 additional copies, at a cost of $233.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRAPO. I now move that the morning hour be dispensed with.

Mr. RANDALL. There seems to be a disposition on this side to consider the Private Calendar, and I think the bill in charge of the gentleman from Massachusetts had better be allowed to go over with the understanding that it will come up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. This is a proposition to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. Which requires a two-thirds vote.

The question being taken on Mr. CRAPO'S motion, there were—ayes 66, noes 53.

So (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the morning hour was not dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Reports by committees of a private nature are in order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees is now concluded.

Mr. CRAPO. I now call up for consideration the special order, House bill No. 4167, to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, to-day being Friday is appropriated under the rules to the consideration of private business. The bill which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CRAPO] desires to call up is a continuing order. On two or three successive Fridays the consideration of private business has been dispensed with, and there is a desire that to-day be devoted to the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. Under the circumstances, as the bill which the gentleman from Massachusetts wishes to bring up will hold its place as a special order to-morrow, I submit that the motion for its consideration now should not prevail. I believe that under the practice a two-thirds vote has been required to dispense with private business on Friday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized to call up the special order.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question is, will the House proceed to the consideration of the special order, House bill No. 4167, to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence?

Mr. CRAPO. I understand that on this question a majority vote only is required.

Mr. RANDALL. But it is an evasion of the two-thirds rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the special order indicated is now in order, but it may be antagonized by the question of consideration. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the special order named.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 16.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. RANDALL and Mr. CRAPO.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 17.

Mr. ROBESON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 116, nays 16, not voting 159; as follows:

Mr. LADD with Mr. JOYCE.

Mr. WAIT with Mr. KENNA.

Mr. PHISTER with Mr. WASHBURN.

Mr. BLANCHARD with Mr. LEWIS.

Mr. ATHERTON with Mr. SHELLEY.

Mr. WAIT. Is there a quorum without my vote?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

Mr. WAIT. I shall vote to make a quorum, as I reserved that right.

Mr. RANDALL moved to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. PARKER. I have a standing pair with Mr. SIMONTON, but the right was reserved to vote to make a quorum. I have therefore voted.

The SPEAKER. On this vote there are—ayes 116, noes 16.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum has voted.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. ROBESON. Has the call disclosed the presence of a quorum?

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and eleven members have answered to their names; which is more than a quorum.

Mr. ROBESON. As it is apparent there is a quorum now present I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question again recurs on proceeding to the consideration of the special order called up by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CRAPO,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 8, not voting, 179; as follows:

During the roll-call,

Mr. HISCOCK said: I desire to inquire of gentlemen on the other side if it will be agreeable to them that the bank-charter-extension bill shall be taken up immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning?

Mr. ROBESON. Why not go on with it now?

Mr. HUTCHINS. A week ago, when the Private Calendar was dispensed with, it was agreed that we should go on with it to-day; and I believe in carrying out that agreement. I am in favor of taking up the bank bill the first thing to-morrow morning.

Several members demanded the regular order.

The Clerk resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. BROWNE. I rise to a point of order. There is so much disorder in the House that we cannot hear the Democratic side respond to their names.

Mr. RANDALL. The disorder is on the other side.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to inquire of the gentleman having the bill——

Mr. ROBESON. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the roll cannot be interrupted in this manner. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the roll-call, as above.

Mr. BOWMAN. I am paired with Mr. MORSE, but the understanding is that I can vote on all questions where he would have voted in the same way. Therefore I have voted on this question.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. URNER with Mr. COVINGTON.

Mr. PHISTER with Mr. WASHBURN.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask consent to record my name on this call. I will state that I was in the House and waited to hear my name called, desiring to vote, but I was unable to hear it.

Mr. RANDALL. The rule is very explicit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that on the statement of the gentleman that he was in his seat, and that his name was not called——

Mr. VALENTINE. He says he was in the House; he could not hear his name called.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has not said so.

Mr. BELFORD. If I was allowed to vote I should vote in the affirmative. I did not near my name called.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest then that the Clerk raise his voice a little, so that the names of members can be heard.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the reading of the names be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I made that motion a short time ago as to another matter, but it did not bear any fruit. Now I object.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not here, and has no right to say any thing.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum has voted.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to use his own words the other day, will not try to coerce the House.

Mr. RANDALL. This is in a good cause. The gentleman was then out of order.

Mr. ATHERTON. I want to state that I was paired on this vote with the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PETTIBONE.] That pair has not been announced. I hope the statement will go into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Pairs are only announced once each day.

Mr. ATHERTON. I was not paired with him on the other vote, but with another gentleman. This pair has not been announced heretofore.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire unanimous consent to ask the gentlemen on the other side of the House, who, under the Constitution, have the power to stop public business in this way, what they propose we shall now do with the public business?

Mr. RANDALL. We desire to proceed according to the rules to consider the Private Calendar, the consideration of which is fixed for to-day.

Mr. ROBESON. I want to make a suggestion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Debate is out of order. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ROBESON. I want to make a suggestion, not an argument.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. We cannot have any understanding that will cut off the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will yield for a suggestion from the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. MURCH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Regular order.

Mr. ROBESON. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to any debate.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to make only a suggestion. I do not wish to debate. Does the gentleman refuse to do the business set down for to-day and refuse also to hear a suggestion?

Mr. TOWSHEND, of Illinois. Let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Maine, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Pending that, I move that we take a recess until 7.30 o'clock this evening, for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Why not consider it now?

Mr. RANDALL. With the understanding——

Mr. ROBESON. I object to debate unless we are allowed to be heard on our side——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let us have the regular order, then.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Maine that the House do now adjourn. That motion is in order.

Mr. MURCH. I want to say——

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable. If the gentleman insists upon the motion the Chair must submit it.

Mr. MURCH. I insist upon it.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] made a motion pending the motion to adjourn. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is in order first.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. MURCH. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, twenty members only voting in favor thereof.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. ROBESON. I now renew the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, that the House take a recess until seven o'clock for the purpose of then considering pension cases——

Mr. RANDALL. Till half-past seven.

Mr. ROBESON. Till half past seven this evening, to proceed with business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. All right.

Mr. RANDALL. No, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ROBESON. I want to see whether gentlemen on the other side want delay on the Private Calendar as well as the public?

Mr. RANDALL. We want to go on now and to-night both.

Mr. ROBESON. We want to go on now with the regular business which has been fixed for to-day by a two-thirds vote, which suspended the Private Calendar and devoted the day to the national-bank bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Private business is what is fixed for to-day.

Mr. ROBESON. If gentlemen want to delay the public business of this House let them say so, not seek to do it under cover of a device to pass private claims they would not pass if they got at them.

Mr. RANDALL. We will take all the responsibility for our action.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that by prior order of the House this evening is set aside for invalid pension and pension cases.

Mr. RANDALL. Does not that order provide for a recess at half past four o'clock?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; we will jog along till that time.

Mr. REED. Yes, jog along. The Democrats want private business; we want public business.

Mr. VALENTINE. They will jog along in the usual Democratic way. There has been too much business done this week for them.

Mr. ROBESON. I withdraw my motion, and move now that there be a call of the House.

The question being taken on Mr. ROBESON's motion, there were—ayes 28, noes 63.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Oh, no; let us rather take a recess.

The question being taken on Mr. BLAND's motion, it was not agreed to.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The question being taken on a division by sound, the Speaker stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 62.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ROBESON. I believe that under a standing order of the House at half past four o'clock to-day a recess will be taken until half past seven o'clock for the consideration of pension bills this evening. I move that the House take a recess until half past four o'clock.

Mr. BRIGGS. I desire to make a statement.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not go on with the Private Calendar now.

Mr. ROBESON. Because we have public business which has been ordered for consideration to-day by a two-thirds vote of the House which gentlemen on the other side are now opposing by these filibustering proceedings. Is it delay on the bank bill or general delay that they want?

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HUBBELL. I rise to a question of personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order before any gentleman is heard. Gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. HUBBELL. I wish to state that just as the House was about to vote on the bill relating to the distribution of the Geneva award the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MCMILLIN, came to me and desired to pair me with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. ERMENTROUT. I assented. It appears Mr. MCMILLIN supposed Mr. ERMENTROUT had left the city, whereas he had not left, and voted on the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. He ought to withdraw his vote.

Mr. HUBBELL. I make no point on that, because it was a misunderstanding. But I desire to say that but for the circumstance I have stated, I should have voted in the negative.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. According to my recollection, the last vote showed there was no quorum.

The SPEAKER. It did.

Mr. BLAND. That being the case, the only motions in order are a motion to adjourn and a motion for a call of the House; and no business can be transacted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think any business has been transacted.

Mr. BLAND. A motion for a recess has been entertained. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make a statement. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] has charge of a special order, popularly known as the pleuro-pneumonia bill. I ask unanimous consent that the House proceed to the consideration of that special order.

Mr. ROBESON. All right; we are willing to do that. That is getting on with the public business.

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope there will be no objection to that proposition.

Mr. HAZELTON. As this is private bill day, I ask unanimous consent to take a private bill from the Calendar and bring it before the House for consideration.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask unanimous consent that we proceed to the consideration of the special order in charge of the Agricultural Committee, popularly known, as I have just stated, as the pleuro-pneumonia bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman cannot antagonize the Private Calendar with that bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK?]

Mr. MCMILLIN. There is. The private citizens of the United States have rights as well as the cattle afflicted with the pleuro-pneumonia.

Mr. BLAND. I insist there can only be two motions when the absence of a quorum is developed; a motion to adjourn and a motion for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri make a motion?

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HAZELTON. What has become of my application?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's application is not in order. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLAND called for a division.

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should adjourn now, would not that cut off pension business to-night?

The SPEAKER. The House is now dividing upon a motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 67.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. BLAND called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being but 9 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I now make the point of order that no motion can be entertained except for a call of the House or to adjourn, no quorum having voted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This bank bill was set down for last Tuesday, not for to-day.

Mr. RYAN. I hope the House will now proceed to the consideration of the pleuro-pneumonia bill.

Mr. VALENTINE. I move that we now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, the pleuro-pneumonia bill.

Mr. RANDALL. And we antagonize that with the Private Calendar.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman has the right to antagonize it, but I make the motion.

Mr. RANDALL. And I object in the interest of the Private Calendar.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is, Will the House now proceed with the consideration of the special order called up by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CRAPO?] That is the question before the House raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] who antagonizes the call for the special order with the Private Calendar. On the last vote no quorum appeared. The yeas and nays having been ordered on that question, and no other motion in order being made, the Chair will again direct the Clerk to call the roll on the question of consideration raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] which question is, Will the House now proceed to consider the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. For what day was that bill set down as the special order?

The SPEAKER. It was set down as a special order for the 9th day of May.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That was last Tuesday, was it not? It was not set down for to-day as the special order.

The SPEAKER. It was made a special order for the 9th day of May, and to continue from day to day until disposed of. For that reason it is the special order for to-day.

Mr. RYAN. If it is in order, I move that the House now take a recess until half past seven this evening.

The motion was not agreed to.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is a call of the roll on the question of consideration raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] against the special order called up by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CRAPO.]

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. I understood that the last roll-call showed no quorum voting. In that case no motion is in order except a motion to adjourn and a motion for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The House has refused to order a call, has refused to adjourn, and has refused to take a recess. The Chair therefore directs the roll to be again called, the former call failing because no quorum voted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Over fifteen members voted for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. And a great many more voted against it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Fifteen is enough to order a call.

The SPEAKER. If there were but fifteen members voting, a majority of that number could order a call of the House; but if more than fifteen members vote, a majority of those voting can vote down the call, as the Chair understands the rule and the practice. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

The question was again taken; and there were—yeas 97, nays 7, not voting 187; as follows:

Mr. RANDALL. Debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. ROBESON. I do not mean to debate anything. Will not gentlemen permit me to say a word?

Mr. HOOKER. Not a word.

Mr. ROBESON. Why the gentleman "bulldozed" this morning until he got ten minutes of public time.

Mr. REED. It was not worth anything to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as we are not able to do any public business to-day, and inasmuch as it is now within fifteen minutes of the time fixed for the recess, I move that the House do now adjourn. [Mr. RANDALL rose.] That motion is not debatable; and I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that the House adjourn. Pending the motion, the Chair, if there be no objection, will submit a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to say that the Committee on Invalid Pensions do not desire a session this evening. [Cries of "No debate!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Enrolled Bills that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 3196) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to change the name of Charles Alton Howard, a second lieutenant in the Ninth Regiment of Cavalry of the Army of the United States, on the register, rolls, and records of the Army, to Alton Henry Budlong; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4229) to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia.

Mr. TALBOTT, by unanimous consent, reported that the same committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 4185) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes.

ELECTION CONTEST, COOK VS. CUTTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House additional evidence in the contested-election case of John C. Cook vs. M. E. Cutts, from the sixth district of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Elections.

FORESTRY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture, transmitting a report on the subject of forestry; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The other day when the vote was taken on the passage of the bill to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture I was not present. I was under the impression that I was paired on that question with the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES.] He understood that the pair, which had been made on a previous day, lasted only during that day. I do not desire him to withdraw his vote. I merely wish to state that if I had been present I should have voted "ay."

Mr. SCALES. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] did speak to me on this matter, and said that he was in favor of the bill; but I did not understand that I was asked to pair with him; therefore I voted.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. CAMP, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. URNER, for one day, on account of important business.

To Mr. HOBLITZELL, for to-morrow, on account of important business.

To Mr. LINDSEY, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. LATHAM, for ten days from and after to-day, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. NEAL, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House all papers in the case of Charles P. Wannall.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine, Mr. MURCH, asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a petition in relation to the French spoliation claims.

There being no objection, leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

The motion of Mr. ROBESON, that the House adjourn, was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 13, 1882.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by Rabbi Jacob Voorsanger, of Houston, Texas.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

TERM OF OFFICE INTERNAL-REVENUE COLLECTORS.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask, by unanimous consent, that the House Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2415) to fix the term of office of collectors of internal revenue, and that it be considered at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enated, &c., That hereafter collectors of internal revenue shall be appointed for a term of four years, and shall continue in office until their successors are appointed and qualified.

SEC. 2. That the commissions of all collectors of internal revenue who shall have served four years or more on the 30th day of June, 1882, shall on and with that date expire: Provided, however, That they shall hold after that date until their successors are appointed and qualified.

SEC. 3. That the commissions of all collectors of internal revenue who shall not have served four years on the 30th day of June, 1882, shall expire when they have completed their term of four years: Provided, however, That they shall hold after the expiration of that term until their successors are appointed and qualified.

SEC. 4. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. BLAND. I must object if it takes up——

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection until the report of the Committee on Ways and Means has been read. It is a unanimous report.

Mr. BLAND. My objection is to unnecessarily taking up time.

Mr. RANDALL. The bill should have some explanation before it is allowed to pass.

Mr. DUNNELL. The report of the Committee on Ways and Means is a short one, and fully explains the necessity for the passage of the bill.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Let us go to the regular order. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. CRAPO. I move to dispense with the morning hour for to-day.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

BUSINESS, POST-OFFICE COMMITTEE.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to offer a resolution for adoption at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Tuesday, May 23, after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of the following-named bills:

H. R. No. 854. To designate, classify, and fix salaries of persons in railway mail service. (Report No. 412.)

H. R. No. 4443. To amend sections 3 and 4 of act of February 21,1879, to fix the pay of letter-carriers. (Report No. 411.)

H. R. No. 5661. To modify postal money-order system, &c. (Report No. 927.)

H. R. No. 859. Regulating rates of postage on second-class mail matter at letter-carrier offices. (Report No. 126.)

H. R. No. 714. To fix compensation of postmasters of the fourth class. (Report No. 127.)

H. R. No. 4198. To establish a postal savings depository, &c. (Report No. 473.)

In the order that may be indicated by the Committee on the Post-office and Post-Roads; this order not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation bills, and to continue in force from day to day thereafter until executed.

Mr. RANDALL. I object, and I desire to give my reasons for my objection. This is a continuing order, and under the decision of the Chair——

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable.

Mr. RANDALL. It is a continuing order, and under the decision of the Speaker is a continuing order even on Friday to prevent the consideration of private business.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. We only ask for one day.

Mr. RANDALL. But it is a continuing order.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was under the impression this business was to be a continuing order from day to day.

Mr. RANDALL. So it is.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is only intended to give these bills one day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am willing to except Friday.

Mr. RANDALL. It is a continuing order, and the Chair has decided where a continuing order is made it vacates Friday for private business.

Mr. SPRINGER. We will except Friday, because we do not wish to interfere with the private business.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads simply ask for one day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I modify the resolution, to except Friday.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object if it excepts Friday.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I object, and call for the regular order.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 6184) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I reserve all points of order on that bill.

SILVER CERTIFICATES.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to report back as a substitute for House bill No. 2459 a bill to suspend the issue of silver certificates and to limit the coinage of silver dollars to the requirements of the people.

Several members demanded the regular order of business.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL BANKS' CHARTERS.

Mr. CRAPO. I now call up the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, and the Clerk will read the bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask that the present reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. RANDALL. It is an important bill, and I think it had better be read.

The SPEAKER. Any member is entitled to have the bill read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That any national banking association organized under the acts of February 25, 1863, June 3, 1864, and February 14, 1880, or under sections 5133, 5134, 5135, 5136, and 5154 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, may at any time within two years previous to the date of the expiration of its corporate existence under present law, and with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, to be granted as hereinafter provided, extend its period of succession by amending its articles of association for a term of not more than twenty years from the expiration of the period of succession named in said articles of association, and shall have succession for such extended period, unless sooner dissolved by the act of shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock, or unless its franchise becomes forfeited by some violation of law.

SEC. 2. That such amendment of said articles of association shall be authorized by the consent in writing of shareholders owning not less than two-thirds of the capital stock of the association; and the board of directors shall cause such consent to be certified over the seal of the association, by its president or cashier, to the Comptroller of the Currency, accompanied by an application made by the president or cashier for the approval of the amended articles of association by the Comptroller; and such amended articles of association shall not be valid until the Comptroller shall give to such association a certificate under his hand and seal that the association has complied with all the provisions required to be complied with, and is authorized to have succession for the extended period named in the amended articles of association.

SEC. 3. That upon the receipt of the application and certificate of the association provided for in the preceding section, the Comptroller of the Currency may, if he deems it necessary, cause a special examination to be made at the expense of the association to determine its condition; and if after such examination or otherwise it appears to him that said association is in a satisfactory condition, he shall grant his certificate of approval provided for in the preceding section, or if it appears that the condition of said association is not satisfactory he shall withhold such certificate of approval.

SEC. 4. That any association so extending the period of its succession shall continue to enjoy all the rights and privileges and immunities granted and shall continue to be subject to all the duties, liabilities, and restrictions imposed by the Revised Statutes of the United States and other acts having reference to national banking associations, and it shall continue to be in all respects the identical association it was before the extension of its period of succession, with the same rights, immunities, and liabilities.

SEC. 5. That when any national banking association has amended its articles of association as provided in this act, and the Comptroller has granted his certificate of approval, any shareholder not assenting to such amendment may give notice in writing to the directors, within thirty days from the date of the certificate of approval, of his desire to withdraw from said association, in which case he shall be entitled to receive from said banking association the value of the shares so held by him, to be ascertained by an appraisal made by a committee of three persons, one to be selected by such shareholder, one by the directors, and the third by the first two; and in case the value so fixed shall not be satisfactory to any such shareholder he may appeal to the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall cause a reappraisal to be made, which shall be final and binding; and if said reappraisal shall exceed the value fixed by said committee the bank shall pay the expenses of said reappraisal, and otherwise the appellant shall pay said expenses; and the value so ascertained and determined shall be deemed to be a debt due to said shareholder from said bank until paid; and the shares so surrendered and appraised shall, after due notice, be sold at public sale, within thirty days after the final appraisal provided in this section.

SEC. 6. That the circulating notes of any association so extending the period of its succession which shall have been issued to it prior to such extension shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, as provided in section 3 of the act of June 20, 1874, entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for redistribution of national-bank currency, and for other purposes," and such notes when redeemed shall be forwarded to the Comptroller of the Currency and destroyed, as now provided by law; and when the amount of such notes shall be reduced to 5 per cent. of the capital stock of the bank issuing the same the association so extended shall deposit lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States sufficient to redeem all of its outstanding circulation, as provided in sections 5222, 5224, and 5225 of the Revised Statutes; and any gain that may arise from the failure to present such circulating notes for redemption shall inure to the benefit of the United States; and from time to time as such notes are redeemed or lawful money deposited therefor, as provided by law, such notes shall be replaced by new circulating notes bearing such devices, to be approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, as shall make them readily distinguishable from the circulating notes heretofore issued.

SEC. 7. That national banking associations whose corporate existence shall expire, and which do not avail themselves of the provisions of this act, shall be required to comply with the provisions of sections 5221 and 5222 of the Revised Statutes in the same manner as if the shareholders had voted to go into liquidation, as provided in section 5220 of the Revised Statutes; and the provisions of sections 5224 and 5225 of the Revised Statutes shall also be applicable to such associations.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 244) for the relief of Mrs. Almira Farnsworth;

A bill (H. R. No. 967) granting a pension to Martha A. Williamson;

A bill (H. R. No. 2433) granting a pension to William Thomas;

A bill (H. R. No. 3738) to donate iron cannon to the township of Milan, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 5240) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for monumental purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 5381) granting an increase of pension to Cecil Clay.

EXTENSION OF NATIONAL-BANK CHARTERS.

Mr. CRAPO rose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask whether there is any order as to the amendments which may be offered to this bill?

The SPEAKER. The answer to that question is better made by having the Clerk read the order of the House fixing the assignment of this bill for consideration as a special order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence be taken from the House Calendar and made the special order for the 9th day of May instant after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation and revenue bills; said bill to be considered by the House as in Committee of the Whole, shall be open to amendment, including committee amendments and an amendment restricting the deposit of lawful money and withdrawal of bonds at pleasure; also an amendment in reference to the jurisdiction of State courts where a bank is situated in the trial of suits with citizens of that locality; also in reference to loans upon real-estate security; and such other amendments and restrictions as may be germane to the bill, or entire substitutes therefor.

Mr. HOLMAN. After the gentleman from Massachusetts has been heard the bill will be open to amendments?

The SPEAKER. The bill will be open to amendments at the proper time within the limits of the order of the House.

Mr. BUCKNER. I wish to inquire whether under the rule as understood by the Chair, with reference to the assignment of this business, we will be confined to the rules ordinarily in force in the Committee of the Whole House, or whether we will have the privilege at the request of one-fifth of the members present to have a vote by yeas and nays recorded upon each distinct proposition upon which a vote may be desired?

Mr. RANDALL. That is the constitutional right of the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in the House to be considered as in Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it in the House as in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. That is the language of the order which has just been read. There is no difficulty as to the manner of proceeding under the rule with the consideration of the bill, but the Chair does not feel called upon to decide any questions in reference to amendments until the proper time shall come.

Mr. RANDALL. That order relates, perhaps, in practice to the free offering of amendments and to debate under the five-minute rule after the closing of the general debate.

The SPEAKER. That is the present opinion of the Chair; but the Chair has already intimated that it does not feel called upon to rule upon questions as to the admissibility of amendments until they shall arise in practice.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask whether general debate will now continue as in Committee of the Whole until closed by order of the House?

The SPEAKER. General debate is in order at this time.

Mr. SPRINGER. That will continue until closed formally by order of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it necessary to decide that question now.

Mr. SPRINGER. We want to understand clearly, so that there may be no misconception as to when the proper time may come for submitting amendments.

The SPEAKER. There will be undoubtedly a time when it will be in order to offer amendments under the order of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the Chair would indicate whether it would be in order to offer amendments now to be pending——

Mr. CRAPO. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that amendments which may be properly in order after the general debate has closed, and which may be offered, be submitted now and printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. There can be no objection to that.

Mr. CRAPO. When the proper time comes these amendments can then be submitted in their order for consideration. Let them be simply printed in the RECORD now for information. I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not to understand that these amendments are pending amendments, but simply printed for the notice of the House?

Mr. CRAPO. That is my object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that proposed amendments be printed in the RECORD for information?

There was no objection.

Mr RANDALL. But the good faith of the order would require that the House should permit these amendments to be voted upon where they are substantive amendments and offered in good faith.

Mr. CRAPO. When the bill is read by sections for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule, of course there can be no objection to these amendments being then considered in their order.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly a time will come when the amendments may be offered. The Chair understands that they are simply offered for printing and information, however, at this time.

Mr. CRAPO. And may be offered when the bill is being read by sections for consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it be understood that when the bill is read by sections that any amendment which is within the spirit and letter of the order may come up for consideration, subject only to the rules of the House, but not be excluded from consideration simply because more amendments are offered than the rules when strictly enforced permit.

Mr. CRAPO. Certainly, whether the amendments are printed in the RECORD or not.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the understanding, then, that as fast as opportunity is given or as fast as amendments are disposed of, other amendments of a substantive character may be offered and voted upon. With that understanding there is no objection to printing the amendments in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The amendments which are now ready to be offered may be sent to the Clerk's desk, and will be printed in the RECORD under the unanimous consent of the House, but not treated as pending amendments until the time comes when they may be offered under the rules of the House.

The following proposed amendment was submitted by Mr. HASELTINE:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That all the interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States now due or optional with the Government, and all other interest-bearing indebtedness as it shall hereafter become due, shall be paid in lawful money of the United States.

"SEC. 2. That all money now in the Treasury, and all revenues of the United States Government not otherwise appropriated, shall be applied in payment of the interest-bearing debt.

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to issue non-interest-bearing Treasury notes of the United States of the denominations of one, two, five, ten, twenty, fifty, and one hundred dollars, which shall be made lawful money and a legal-tender at its face value for all taxes, revenues, and debts, public and private, within the United States, which may be necessary in addition to the aforesaid money and revenues to pay the said interest-bearing debt now due, and also the interest-bearing debt now optional with the Government, and all other interest-bearing debts as they shall respectively become due.

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to issue Treasury notes made a full legal tender and lawful money in denominations convenient for currency, and in quantity equal to any contraction which may be caused by the withdrawal of national-bank notes.

"SEC. 4. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Proposed amendment of House bill No. 4167, as a new section to come in at the end of the bill, by Mr. BUCKNER:

SEC. 8. That section 5191 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5191. Every national banking association in either of the following cities, Albany, Baltimore, Boston, Cincinnati, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, Louisville, Milwaukee, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Saint Louis, San Francisco, and Washington, shall at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, (three-fifths of which shall be in standard gold or silver coins,) an amount equal to at least 30 per cent. of the aggregate amount of its notes in circulation and its deposits; and every other association shall at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, (three-fifths of which shall be in standard gold and silver coins of the United States,) an amount equal to at least 20 per cent. of the aggregate amount of its notes in circulation and of its deposits. Whenever the lawful money of any association in any of the cities named shall be below the amount of 30 per cent. of its circulation and deposits, and whenever the lawful money of any other association shall be below 20 per cent. of its circulation and deposits, such association shall not increase its liabilities by making any new loans or discounts otherwise than by discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight, nor make any dividend of its profits until the required proportion between the aggregate amount of its outstanding notes of circulation and deposits and its lawful money of the United States in the proportion required as to coin has been restored. And the Comptroller of the Currency may notify any association whose lawful money reserve shall be below the amount and proportion of coin as above required to be kept on hand to make good such reserve; and if such association shall fail for thirty days thereafter so to make good its reserve of lawful money, and in the proportion aforesaid, the Comptroller may, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, appoint a receiver to wind up the business of the association, as provided in section 5234: Provided, That neither clearing-house certificates nor the balances provided for in section 5192 shall be counted or deemed any portion of the coin reserves required by section ——; and hereafter the circulating notes of all banking associations shall be redeemed at the counters of the respective banking associations, or at the Treasury at Washington, at the option of the holders of such circulating notes, any law to the contrary notwithstanding."

The following proposed amendment, as section 9 of House bill No. 4167, was also submitted by Mr. BUCKNER:

SEC. 9. No national banking association now in existence, or organized hereafter, or whose corporate existence may be continued under the provisions of this act, shall issue any note for circulation of a less denomination than $10, and the maximum amount of bank-note circulation is hereby fixed at the sum thereof outstanding at the passage of this act, and no reduction below that sum shall be permitted, except in cases of involuntary liquidation, and in which the bonds held by the Treasury for the security of such circulation are called for redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury; and in such cases the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to cause to be printed and engraved Treasury notes of like tenor and effect with the present legal-tender notes in denominations of ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred, and one thousand dollars, which shall be receivable for all dues to the Government and shall be received in all parts of the United States in payment of all salaries, debts, and other demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, and associations within the United States, except where some other mode of payment is expressly provided by law or contract; and when the bonds so held shall be withdrawn by any banking association by making a deposit of lawful money sufficient to redeem its outstanding note circulation the said Treasury notes, authorized by this section, shall be paid out by the Treasury in redemption of the notes of such banking associations whose bonds are called for redemption, or which may go into involuntary liquidation, and for no other purpose. Said notes shall be signed by the Treasurer of the United States and countersigned by the Register of the Treasury, or their signatures engraved; and they shall be redeemed in standard gold and silver coin at the office of the assistant treasurer when presented, in sums of not less than $100. And for the purpose of the prompt redemption of said Treasury notes the Secretary of the Treasury shall maintain a redemption fund, in standard gold and silver coin, not exceeding 25 and not less than 15 per cent. of the outstanding issue of said Treasury notes; and in order to obtain said coin redemption fund he is hereby authorized to set aside from accruing surplus revenues from time to time such sums of standard gold and silver coin as, with the redemption fund for the outstanding legal-tender notes now held in the Treasury, will constitute the maximum percentage, above stated, on the aggregate outstanding legal-tender circulation and the Treasury notes in this section authorized; and said Treasury notes may be re-issued as now provided by law as to the legal-tender notes.

The following proposed substitute was submitted by Mr. BUCKNER, for the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the charter of any national banking association is about to expire, or whenever any such association shall, by a vote of its shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock, determine to go into liquidation, and the bonds deposited by such bank to secure its circulation, or any part thereof, shall consist of 5 or 6 per cent. bonds now continued at 3½ per cent. interest, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, said association shall make a deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, of lawful money, sufficient to redeem all its outstanding circulation, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to exchange the notes hereinafter authorized for the bonds so held by said banking association at par and accrued interest, or he may exchange the notes aforesaid for standard gold or silver coin, and redeem said bonds with coin; and thereafter the circulating notes of said bank shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, with all the notes hereafter authorized, and when so redeemed said circulating notes shall be canceled and destroyed. And any national banking association whose circulation is secured by bonds of the United States other than those above described, and whose charter is about to expire, or whose stockholders, by a vote of two-thirds thereof in amount, shall determine to go into liquidation, shall proceed, as provided in sections 5221, 5222, 5224, and 5225 of the Revised Statutes, by making a deposit of the notes hereinafter authorized; legal-tender notes, or gold or silver coin, and thereafter the circulating notes of such banking association shall be redeemed at the Treasury with the notes hereinafter authorized, which may be reissued as now provided as to legal-tender notes.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be printed and engraved Treasury notes of the United States, to an amount not exceeding the present outstanding national-bank-note circulation, with such devices and inscriptions as he may direct and approve, in denominations of ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred, and one thousand dollars, and which shall be made payable on demand, at the office of the assistant treasurer in the city of New York, in standard gold or silver coin, when presented in sums of not less than $100; and said notes shall be signed by the Treasurer and countersigned by the Register of the Treasury, or their signatures thereto engraved. Said Treasury notes shall be receivable by the United States for all taxes, customs, dues, demands, and claims of the United States and shall be received at par in all parts of the United States in payment for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, and associations within the United States, except where some other mode of payment is expressly provided by law.

SEC. 3. That no national banking association shall hereafter be organized; nor shall any circulating notes be hereafter issued to any bank now organized, except in redemption of mutilated, worn, and defaced notes issued by such banking institutions already organized, and outstanding at the passage of this act; nor shall any existing banking association increase its circulation, or the amount of Treasury notes authorized by this act exceed at any time the amount of national-bank notes outstanding at the passage of this act. And for the purpose of the prompt redemption of said Treasury notes the Secretary of the Treasury shall maintain a redemption fund, in standard gold and silver coin, of not exceeding 25 and not less than 15 per cent. of the outstanding issue of said Treasury notes; and in order to obtain said coin redemption fund he is hereby authorized to set aside from accruing surplus revenues, from time to time, such sums of standard gold and silver coin as with the redemption fund for the outstanding legal-tender notes now held in the Treasury will constitute the maximum percentage above stated on the outstanding legal-tender circulation and the Treasury note circulation hereby authorized.

SEC. 4. That all taxes on bank checks now authorized by law are hereby abolished after the expiration of six months from the passage of this act; and section 5214 of the Revised Statutes, so far as it imposes taxes on the deposits and the capital stock of banking institutions and bankers, is hereby repealed as to all bankers and banks not issuing circulating notes.

Mr. RANDALL. I will submit an amendment relating to the power of the banks to deposit greenbacks and take up bonds. I will furnish it to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better submit it in writing.

Mr. RANDALL. I will do so.

The following proposed amendment was submitted by Mr. RANDALL:

And section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes," is hereby amended to the effect that national banks intending to withdraw the whole or any part of the bonds interest upon which has not ceased held by the Treasurer of the United States in trust to secure their circulating notes, and to deposit lawful money in lieu thereof for the purpose of retiring or redeeming their circulation, shall be required, in case of each separate intended withdrawal, to give ninety days' notice of such intention, in writing, to the Comptroller of the Currency; and sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are hereby re-enacted: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to repeal, modify, or in any manner affect existing provisions of law respecting national banks in process of, or going into, liquidation as contained in sections 5220, 5221, 5222, 5223, or 5224 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or to prevent the withdrawal, without notice, of bonds interest on which has ceased.

The following proposed amendment was submitted by Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia:

Amend the fourth section by adding thereto:

"Provided, however, That the jurisdiction for suits hereafter brought by or against any association established under any law providing for national banking associations, except suits between them and the United States or its officers and agents, shall be the same as, and not other than, the jurisdiction for suits by or against banks not organized under any law of the United States which do or might do banking business where such national banking association may be doing business when such suits may be begun; and all laws and parts of laws of the United States inconsistent with this proviso be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

The following proposed amendment was submitted by Mr. CULBERSON:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That it shall not be lawful, after the passage of this act, to grant a franchise to any association of persons to carry on the business of banking under said act; nor shall it be lawful to revive, renew, or reorganize any association of persons heretofore organized under said act.

"SEC. 2. That whenever a banking association shall cease to exist under the operation of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to prepare Treasury notes of denominations suitable for circulation, and in amount equal to notes of such bank. Such Treasury notes shall be receivable for all taxes, excises, and all dues whatsoever to the Government. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time to pay out such notes to the creditors of the Government who may elect to receive the same in payment of their claims at par, and shall from time to time exchange said notes for silver bullion or coined standard dollars, or for any outstanding bonds of the Government, whenever such exchange can be made at par. And when such notes shall be received into the Treasury in payment of dues or other demands, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay out the same from time to time as there may be demand for them."

The following proposed amendment was submitted by Mr. SCALES, to come in as additional sections:

SEC. —. That all national banking associations chartered and doing business under the laws of the United States in any of the States be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to make loans to the amount of one-fourth of their capital and surplus upon the pledge and mortgage of real estate as security therefor, subject to such conditions as may be required and imposed by the boards of directors of the respective banks, either specially made or expressed in the by-laws which may be adopted for the government of each particular national banking association.

SEC. —. All laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The following proposed substitute was submitted by Mr. BRUMM:

A bill to facilitate the payment of the public debt, and to provide a uniform paper circulation.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 5224 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended by striking out the words "have power to sell," in the tenth line, and inserting the word "cancel;" and by striking out the words "at public auction in," in the eleventh line, the words "New York City," in the twelfth line, and the words "and the necessary expenses of the sale to" in the thirteenth line of said section.

SEC. 2. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, shall, upon the expiration of its charter, return to the Treasurer of the United States its circulating notes, or make a sufficient deposit of lawful money to redeem its outstanding circulation, whereupon the bonds deposited by the association to secure payment of its notes shall be reassigned to it in the manner prescribed by section 5162; and thereafter the association and its shareholders shall stand discharged from all liabilities upon the circulating notes, and said notes shall be redeemed and canceled at the Treasury of the United States. And if any such association shall fail to make the deposit and take up its bonds for thirty days after the expiration of its charter, the Comptroller of the Currency shall cancel the bonds pledged for the circulation of said association; and after providing for the redemption and cancellation of said circulation he shall pay over any balance remaining to the association or its legal representatives.

SEC. 3. That from and after the passage of this act the Treasurer shall not be permitted to issue or sell any United States bonds.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be printed and engraved notes of the United States, in addition to those heretofore authorized, and of the same kind and character as those now in circulation, in denominations of one, two, five, ten, twenty, fifty, and one hundred dollars, to an amount not exceeding the aggregate national-bank-note circulation.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to substitute and pay out the notes hereby authorized, in lieu of the national-bank notes now outstanding and in circulation, as soon as said bank notes are redeemed.

SEC. 6. That for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects of this act the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper. And all acts and parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The following proposed substitute was also submitted by Mr. BRUMM:

A bill to retire national-bank notes, and to substitute therefor Treasury notes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act all notes of national banks which may be received by the Treasury Department, or by any officer thereof, shall be forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury, at Washington City, who shall retain the same and shall not pay them out again for any purpose whatever, but shall assort them; and whenever the notes of any one bank shall be received to the amount of $1,000 it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to immediately notify the officers of such bank, and require them to come forward and lift the bonds of the United States pledged for the redemption of said notes, to an amount equal to the said national-bank notes so held; which notes so redeemed shall be immediately canceled and destroyed by the Secretary, in accordance with the provisions and requirements of existing laws.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever the notes of any national bank to the amount of $1,000 or more shall be canceled and destroyed under the provisions of this act, to cause to be printed and made ready for issue, under the form provided in the law of 1862, and subsequent acts, authorizing the issue of Treasury notes, an amount of Treasury notes exactly equal to the amount of national-bank notes so canceled and destroyed; which said Treasury notes shall be issued and paid out, for any and all demands against the Government of the United States, as fast as may be by law authorized and permitted; and when so issued they shall be held and esteemed a legal tender for all purposes not otherwise previously provided or forbidden by law.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever the amount of Treasury notes issued under authority of this act shall accumulate to the amount of $100,000, to expend the same in the purchase of any of the interest-bearing bonds of the United States which may be authorized by existing laws, and in conformity with their provisions.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby prohibited, from and after the passage of this act, from receiving on deposit any bonds of the United States as a pledge or security for any further issue of national-bank notes to circulate as currency or money.

SEC. 5. That national-bank notes shall hereafter be received for all dues to the Government of the United States on the same footing as other lawful money.

SEC. 6. That all laws or parts of laws not consistent with this act, or in conflict with it, are hereby repealed.

The following proposed amendment was submitted by Mr. HOLMAN:

Add to the fourth section of the bill the following words:

"Provided however, That such association shall not have the right to bring or maintain any action in the circuit court of the United States for the judicial district in which such association shall be established against any citizen of such district, or be liable to any action in such circuit court in favor of such citizen; and every such association shall, in respect to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, be deemed a citizen of the State in which the same is established."

The following proposed amendment was submitted by Mr. COX, of North Carolina:

Amendment to come in after line 10, section 3:

"And to prevent a contraction of the currency, whenever any national bank shall fail to renew its charter or continue its business, or whenever any national bank shall withdraw or decrease its circulation, it shall be the duty of the Treasurer of the United States to issue United States Treasury notes of a like quantity and of such denomination as he may deem proper to replace such notes so withdrawn; and no bank after so withdrawing its notes shall have the right to issue others to replace them."

The following proposed amendment was submitted by Mr. BURROWS, of Missouri:

Add:

"SEC. 8. Whenever any banking association organized under the provisions of this act, shall withdraw from circulation their circulating notes, or shall take up their bonds deposited with the Comptroller of the Currency by depositing Treasury notes or those of their own with a view of retiring the same, such association shall not again be permitted to increase the volume of its circulation for a period of twelve months next succeeding the date of such retirement."

The following proposed amendment was submitted by Mr. CANNON:

Provided, That national banks now organized or hereafter organized having a capital of $150,000 or less shall not be required to keep or deposit with the Treasurer of the United States United States bonds in excess of $10,000 as security for their circulating notes, and such of those banks having on deposit bonds in excess of that amount are authorized to reduce their circulation by the deposit of lawful money as provided by law.

The following proposed amendment was submitted by Mr. STOCKSLAGER:

SEC. —. That the circuit and district courts of the United States shall not have jurisdiction of any suit by or against any association established under any law providing for national banking associations, or any law enabling such associations to extend their corporate existence, except where the parties to said suit reside in different States, and except, also, all suits brought by or against any banking association established in the district for which the court is held, under the provisions of title "the national banks," to enjoin the Comptroller of the Currency, or any receiver acting under his direction, as provided in section 5237 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

SEC. —. All laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of the foregoing section are hereby repealed.

The following proposed substitute was submitted by Mr. BLAND:

A bill to retire the circulation of national banks, and to continue them as banks of discount and deposit.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any national banking association organized under the acts of February 25, 1863; June 3, 1864, and February 14, 1880; or under sections 5133, 5134, 5135, 5136, and 5154 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, may, at any time within two years previous to the date of the expiration of its corporate existence under present law, and with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, to be granted as hereinafter provided, extend its period of succession, by amending its articles of association, for a term of not more than twenty years from the expiration of the period of succession named in said articles of association, and shall have succession for such extended period, unless sooner dissolved by the act of shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock, or unless its franchise becomes forfeited by some violation of law.

SEC. 2. That such amendment of such articles of association shall be authorized by the consent in writing of shareholders owning not less than two-thirds of the capital stock of the association; and the board of directors shall cause such consent to be certified over the seal of the association, by its president or cashier, to the Comptroller of the Currency, accompanied by an application made by the president or cashier for the approval of the amended articles of association by the Comptroller; and such amended articles of association shall not be valid until the Comptroller shall give to such association a certificate under his hand and seal that the association has complied with all the provisions required to be complied with, and is authorized to have succession for the extended period named in the amended articles of association.

SEC. 3. That upon the receipt of the application and certificate of the association provided for in the preceding section, the Comptroller of the Currency may, if he deems it necessary, cause a special examination to be made, at the expense of the association, to determine its condition; and if after such examination or otherwise it appears to him that said association is in a satisfactory condition, he shall grant his certificate of approval provided for in the preceding section, or if it appears that the condition of said association is not satisfactory, he shall withhold such certificate of approval,

SEC. 4. That any association so extending the period of its succession shall continue to enjoy all the rights and privileges and immunities granted and shall continue to be subject to all the duties, liabilities, and restrictions imposed by the Revised Statutes of the United States and other acts having reference to national banking associations, and it shall continue to be in all respects the identical association it was before the extension of its period of succession, with the same rights, immunities, and liabilities: Provided, That said associations are hereby prohibited from issuing circulating notes and hereafter no national banking association shall increase its circulation or be organized with authority to issue notes to circulate as money.

SEC. 5. That when any national banking association has amended its articles of association as provided in this act, and the Comptroller has granted his certificate of approval, any shareholder not assenting to such amendment may give notice in writing to the directors, within thirty days from the date of the certificate of approval, of his desire to withdraw from said association, in which case he shall be entitled to receive from said banking association the value of the shares so held by him, to be ascertained by an appraisal made by a committee of three persons, one to be selected by such shareholder, one by the directors, and the third by the first two; and in case the value so fixed shall not be satisfactory to any such shareholder he may appeal to the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall cause a reappraisal to be made, which shall be final and binding; and if said reappraisal shall exceed the value fixed by said committee the bank shall pay the expenses of said reappraisal, and otherwise the appellant shall pay said expenses; and the value so ascertained and determined shall be deemed to be a debt due to said shareholder from said bank until paid; and the shares so surrendered and appraised shall, after due notice, be sold at public sale, within thirty days after the final appraisal provided in this section.

SEC. 6. That national banking associations that may be continued by this act, and those whose corporate existence shall expire, shall be required to comply with the provisions of sections 5221 and 5222 of the Revised Statutes in the same manner as if the shareholders had voted to go into liquidation, as provided in section 5220 of the Revised Statutes; and the provisions of section 5224 not inconsistent herewith shall also be applicable to such associations.

SEC. 7. That all the moneys deposited in the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of redeeming the circulation of national banking associations shall be deemed surplus revenues, and used in the payment of the current expenditures of the Government, and in the extinguishment of the interest-bearing debt of the United States, in the same manner as other surplus revenues are authorized to be expended.

SEC. 8. That for the purpose of retiring and canceling the notes of national banking associations surrendering their circulation the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be printed and engraved Treasury notes of the United States, of the denominations of five, ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred, and one thousand dollars, bearing such inscriptions and devices as he may approve, to be exchanged for the bank notes above described on presentation of the same at the Treasury; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be issued said Treasury notes in lieu of such bank notes as shall become the property of the Government in payment of taxes or otherwise; and that the bank notes for which Treasury notes shall be substituted shall be destroyed.

SEC. 9. That the Treasury notes issued in pursuance of this act shall be receivable and payable for all dues and demands for which national-bank notes are now by law receivable and payable, and shall be exchangeable for legal-tender notes when presented in sums of one hundred dollars or more, for that purpose at the Treasury of the United States, but when so exchanged shall be paid out of the Treasury again as other current funds; and that said Treasury notes shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, in legal-tender notes or coin, at the option of the Government.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry any of the provisions of this act into effect.

Mr. CRAPO. Mr. Speaker, the first national-bank act was approved February 25, 1863. Authority was given by that act for the organization of banking associations with succession for a period not exceeding twenty years from the passage of the act. A subsequent act of Congress, approved June 3, 1864, limited the succession to the banks which organized under it to the term of twenty years from the dates of their respective organizations, thereby adopting a different limitation from that in the original act. All of the banks organized under the earlier statute terminate their corporate existence on or before February 25, 1883. One bank expired by limitation in January last, another on the 11th of April, and from this date to February 25, 1883, there are three hundred and ninety-three banks whose corporate existence will terminate.

If the banks whose charters are expiring are to continue in business under their present organization it is necessary for Congress to pass an act authorizing the extension of their present corporate term. In order to secure the continuance of nearly four hundred banks the requisite legislation must be consummated without delay.

It is not necessary in this discussion to recite the causes which led to the national banking act. The pressing exigencies of the Government and the urgent condition of its finances which prompted the creation of the banks have not been forgotten, neither have the valuable and substantial benefits which through them were secured in the placing of the public debt and the maintenance of the public credit. Every expectation of the original promoters of the national banking scheme has been fully realized in the aid given by these associations in sustaining the finances of the country during a period of extraordinary peril. But the remembrance of past services, however patriotic or meritorious, will not influence Congress in its treatment of the national banks at this time. The question of their continuance depends rather upon the character of their present work and their capacity for future usefulness. If the needs of business, the requirements of commerce, the advancement of the industries, and the development of the resources of the country can be better promoted by the present system of banking than by any other, then the present system will be, as it should be, continued.

No one questions the wisdom or necessity of banking institutions. Without them the business transactions of the world cannot be conducted. Through their agency idle and scattered capital is collected and given activity and usefulness. The banks bridge the space between the producer and consumer; they give to enterprise and sagacity, by an arrangement of credits, the means to compete with accumulated wealth, and they reduce the interest burdens of debtors and borrowers. In some form we must have banks. If the national authority refuses to provide for their organization and management then the States will assume the duty, or, if the latter fail to act, the banking of the country will fall into the hands of individuals, freed from all national or State supervision.

Are the national banks worthy of continuance? The unanimous judgment of the people, even of those who from political considerations oppose them, is that the system is an admirable one for the business interests of the country. I do not claim that all the provisions regulating their management are perfect. It would be an improvement, in my opinion, if the portion of the reserves of the banks required to be kept in their vaults was restricted to coin, instead of lawful money, thereby lessening the danger of inability to protect by specie payments our greenback currency. The possession of $70,000,000 of greenback notes by the banks, which is the amount now held by them, during a time of general distrust and panic might lead to such demands upon the gold in the Treasury as to imperil the ability of the Government to maintain specie payments. It is probable that the method for the redemption of bank notes may be made more prompt and efficient, thereby securing that elasticity of currency which was promised by the national-banking system, but which has not been fully realized.

But whatever changes and improvements may be suggested, I assert that this country has never possessed a system of banking which in any degree compared with the present in excellence and safety. No previous system has in an equal manner commanded the confidence and promoted the prosperity of the people. Under it over twenty-six hundred banks, located in every State and Territory, have been organized. Wherever local necessities and local enterprise have called for them they have been established, and by their operations they have facilitated local industries and trade and have developed local wealth and prosperity. They are not great moneyed monopolies. Unlike railroad and manufacturing corporations, the aggregation of large capital in national banks can neither absorb competing business nor gain special privileges. The bank of $50,000 of capital has the same or better legal privileges than the bank of $1,000,000 capital. Hence they have been established, not alone in the great cities where they might seek to control and dictate the monetary affairs of the country, but wherever and whenever the promotion of business, manufactures, and trade have required their agency.

This is evident from the scattered location of the banks and the respective amounts of their capital. On the 1st day of October last there were in operation 2,148 banks, of which number 393 had each a capital of only $50,000. There were 164 banks with capital from $50,000 to $100,000, and 829 with capital from $100,000 to $150,000. Of the whole number of national banks, 1,386, or 65 per cent., have a capital stock of $150,000 or less. Since October 1, 1881, more than one-half of the banks organized have a capital of $50,000 each. Banks with small capital for local convenience are being organized every week. These new banking associations are located largely in the West, at points where agricultural products are marketed or where manufactures are developing. The new business enterprises and industries of the South are calling for the economies and facilities of national banks, as is seen by their increase in that section.

The relation which banking holds to the commercial prosperity of the country is so intimate that it is of the first importance that its banking system shall be safe, efficient, and permanent. The experience of twenty years, covering periods of depression and prosperity, has tested the merits of the present system. The advantages of the system are found in its uniformity, its restrictions, its responsibility, and its supervision. The capital fund must be paid in full, and a portion of it must be invested in Government bonds. If the capital from any cause becomes impaired it must be promptly restored. It discourages the loaning of money upon securities not readily convertible; it limits the amount which can be loaned to any one person or corporation, and forbids the lending of money on their own circulating notes or upon shares of their own stock. It prohibits a rate of interest greater than that allowed by the laws of the State where located, and requires a fixed percentage of reserve to meet the demands of depositors and noteholders. It allows no preferences in the event of insolvency. It gives a double security to creditors by making individually responsible the shareholders for all contracts, debts, and engagements of the bank to an amount equal to the par value of their shares, in addition to their investments in said shares. It requires the accumulation of a surplus fund, which can only be used to meet losses and bad debts in excess of current earnings, and forbids the payment of dividends not earned. It compels full statements of resources and liabilities, under oath, to be made several times each year, and the publication of the same. It subjects the banks to a personal examination by experts appointed by the Comptroller, who inspect the accounts securities, and assets, and inquire into their liabilities and investigate their methods of business, thereby restraining and detecting irregular practices. It gives publicity to the ownership of shares, thereby fixing individual liability and facilitating local taxation. It secures the redemption of their circulating notes and their ready conversion into lawful money, and the destruction of their worn and mutilated bills. It inflicts penalties which are severe and summary for the violation or non-performance of the provisions of the national banking act.

What are the objections to the continuance of this system and to the continuance of the corporate existence of the present national banks? The bill under consideration authorizes the extension of the period of succession for a term not exceeding twenty years, provided the shareholders owning not less than two-thirds of the capital stock consent thereto. It is suggested that this power of consent given to two-thirds of the shareholders may work a hardship to a shareholder, or to a minority of shareholders, who prefer to retire from the banking business; that the shareholder who is unwilling to risk his investment for a new period of twenty years should be permitted to retire with the full value of his shares and not be compelled to accept for the same whatever price the majority shareholders or the public may see fit to give when sold in the market. Congress clearly has the right to extend these bank charters and to prescribe the qualifications necessary to secure the benefits of the enabling act. It may provide for the unanimous vote of the shareholders or simply the usual method of expressing the wishes of associated bodies, namely, a majority vote. The compliance with the requirements would be binding upon the minority, for in no other way can the will of a corporation be made effective. The existing law authorizes the liquidation of a banking association before the expiration of its charter by a vote of two-thirds. The proposed bill authorizes the continuance of business by the same vote of two-thirds. But that no possible wrong may be done to the minority, and to silence all complaints and suggestions that the dissenting shareholder who wishes to retire may be forced to sell his shares at less than their intrinsic worth, the bill provides for an impartial appraisal of the assets of the bank, guarded by an appeal in case of dissatisfaction, and furnishes to him a cash purchaser for his shares at their full value. The dissenting shareholder by this bill can realize for his shares all that could be obtained through liquidation, with greater certainty and promptness.

A further objection has been made that the extension of the bank charters will practically postpone the realization by the Government of the gains from the lost and destroyed bank-note circulation. The banks pay all of the expenses for the plates from which their notes are issued. They pay for all the expenses attending the redemption of their notes, and for the maintenance of an expensive redemption and reissue bureau, while all the advantages which accrue from the lost and destoyed bank notes inure to the Government. But it is urged that this gain cannot be ascertained and utilized by the Government until the notes in circulation have been called in and canceled under the process of liquidation. There can be no doubt, while all the burdens attending the issue and circulation of bank notes fall upon the banks, that all the gain from loss of bank notes inures to the Government. To avoid any delay in receiving this gain the sixth section of the bill provides for a new issue of bank notes and a redemption of the present issue as summarily and effectually as is possible by the liquidation of the banks. The bill under consideration disposes of all doubts, if any exist, as to who shall receive the profits resulting from lost bank-notes.

It is suggested that the proposed legislation is not necessary, because the banks, as their charters expire, have simply to go into liquidation, and under the existing law to organize anew for a further term of twenty years. But the same results are not reached by this indirect method for continuing existing banking business. I claim that there are positive advantages which are gained by the extension of present charters, and that there are serious difficulties attending the liquidation of two thousand two hundred banks and the organization of a like number in their stead.

The extension of existing charters continues to the banks the holding of undivided profits and surplus amounting to over $184,000,000. This reserve from earnings, which has been set aside by virtue of a compulsory statute, has enabled the banks to meet successfully the disasters and losses of financial panics, has given confidence in their stability, and has prevented at times such reduction of their capital as would have imperiled their own safety and caused great injury to their customers. It was largely in consequence of this undivided reserve that the national banks were able to sustain losses through the failure of their debtors, between 1876 and 1879, amounting to $85,845,069, and at the same time to continue their loans to those dependent upon them for money accommodations. If the passage of this bill is refused, the new banks, if such are organized, commence with their capital fund only, and the surplus of the expiring banks is necessarily divided out in liquidation among the shareholders, unless every shareholder consents to its transfer to a new organization. The shareholders may be benefited by this division of surplus, but the public is protected by its retention.

The extension of existing charters secures the continuance of present management and methods of business, retains the responsibility of present stockholders, the experience of present officers, and the advantages of present financial reputation. New associations must of necessity be formed by new articles, and the promoters of the new banks will be at liberty to include in or exclude from their subscription such of the old shareholders as they may arbitrarily select. In this way the investments of small shareholders, of absent shareholders, and of trust estates may be sacrificed through the greed of directors and large holders.

But assuming, in the event of non-action by Congress, that there will be a general organization of new banks under the present statute, supplying the places of those expiring by limitation, even then there may be, and in my opinion there will be, results disastrous to the business of the country. If this bill or some bill continuing the present national banks is not passed at this session there necessarily follows the liquidation of three hundred and ninety-three banks within the next ten months. This will compel the withdrawal of $68,070,980 of lawful money now in circulation in order to procure the $75,768,700 of United States bonds lodged with the Comptroller, and which can only be withdrawn, whether for sale or for delivery to the new banking associations taking the place of those liquidating, by the deposit in the United States Treasury of lawful money. This withdrawal and locking up of nearly $70,000,000 of circulation pending the slow return of the bank notes may result in stringency leading to panic. Upon one day, February 25, 1883, the charters of two hundred and ninety-seven banks expire, involving a return to the Treasury of $54,000,000 of lawful money. Such a contraction of the currency, coming in a single day or a single month, cannot but disturb the business of the country and seriously affect the values of property. It may be said that the issue of bills to the newly organized banks will in a few months restore a portion of the needed currency. But this relief will come slowly, and only after the disaster and losses resulting from this violent derangement of the currency.

The real opposition to this bill comes from an antagonism to national-bank notes, and from a disposition to have the credit currency of the country issued by the Government alone, and not by incorporated associations, however secure such circulation may be made. There is a clamor that the banks are making vast sums by the circulation of their bills, and that the public Treasury is robbed or impoverished by the payment of interest on the bonds which the Government compels the banks to own for the security of their notes. If the banks are to issue notes at all, it will be conceded that it is the first duty of the Government to provide for their certain payment. This is done by the pledge of United States bonds with ample margin. No better scheme for absolute security was ever devised. This deposit of bonds to secure their circulation was not solicited by the banks, but was ordered for the protection of the people. The extravagant assertions made by the opponents of the national banks of the excessive gains derived from bank-note circulation are erroneous and misleading. There is not enough of profit in this circulation to induce the organization of a bank. With a 3 per cent. United States bond at par—which is the rate named in the pending funding bill—the actual net profit derived from circulation is 1.14 per cent. when the rate of interest on bank loans is 6 per cent., is 1 per cent. when the rate of interest is 7 per cent., and is .85 per cent. when the rate of interest is 8 per cent. The higher the market rate of interest the less the profits from circulation. And yet in the centers where money accumulates and the rates of interest rule lowest, and where the largest profits can be made on circulation, we witness no disposition to an increase of bank circulation.

No error is more persistently repeated than the assertion that enormous profits are derived from bank-note circulation. The net profits from circulation which I have stated are from the figures furnished by the Treasury Department, and they show the maximum profits, supposing every dollar of bills to be in use. In illustration of the actual profits derived from bank-note circulation, taking a bank of average capital and business, I give the figures for the year 1881 on the circulation of the First National Bank of Troy, New York, a bank of $300,000 capital, and with that amount of United States bonds deposited for circulation, drawing interest at 3½ per cent., and which cost at the market rate of 102 the sum of $306,000, and upon which the bank received $270,000 circulation. The statement which has been furnished by the cashier of the bank is as follows:

DEBIT.

One year's interest on cost of $300,000, at 102—$306,000—6 per cent	$18,360 00
United States tax on $262,626, notes in circulation, for one year, 1 per cent	2,626 26
One year's interest at 6 per cent. on $13,500 deposited with Treasurer United States for 5 per cent. reserve	810 00
Treasurer United States charges for redeeming	168 94
Agent at Washington for witnessing destruction mutilated currency	50 00
Transportation on currency from Washington	54 30
Sinking fund for premiums on 3½ per cent. bonds if not redeemed in two years	3,000 00
Total	25,069 50

CREDIT.

Received for one year's interest on $262,626, notes in circulation, at 6 per cent	15,757 56
Received for one year's interest at 3½ on $300,000, United States bonds deposited with Treasurer United States to secure circulation	10,500 00
Total income	26,257 56
Deduct debit account	25,069 50
Net annual income from circulation	1,188 06

Thus it will be seen that for an investment of $300,000 in United States bonds at 3½ per cent. the stockholders of the bank receive on their circulation a profit of $1,188.06, which is at the rate of .39½ per cent. on the investment, or about one-third of 1 per cent.

A bank of $50,000 capital, which has been organized for the conveniences of local trade and manufactures, has a right to issue $45,000 of bank notes. The profits derived therefrom, if the bank can loan the bills at 7 per cent., amount to $450. Not an alarming sum, but it helps pay a clerk or helps pay the rent of the banking rooms, and to this extent the bank is encouraged and strengthened and the business men of that community benefited by securing banking facilities. The profits from circulation do not tempt the organization of large banking institutions. The tendency with banks of large capital is to drop the circulation of notes as not sufficiently compensating the expenses and trouble attending their issue and redemption. This is apparent from the returns of the New York City banks, which show eleven great banks in that city with scarcely any circulation, many of them being absolutely without circulation. But in the rural districts, and at points remote from the great centers of trade, where banking facilities are needed for local accommodation and development, the item of circulation is deemed of importance. The large proportion, more than one-half, of the new banks organizing have a capital of only $50,000 each, and they are located mostly in the Western and Southern States and in the Territories. These banks are important factors in the industry and growth of those sections, and our legislation should favor rather than prohibit them.

But there are those who contend that, even with the safeguards and restrictions and supervision and taxation which the Government imposes upon national-bank notes, the Government directly and not indirectly should issue the paper money of the country, and that this part of our banking should be done exclusively by the Government itself. Many, perhaps the majority, of those who hold this view believe in the theory of fiat money, and assert that the stamp of the Government placed on paper is sufficient for all the purposes of money. These men think the greenbacks are at par because Congress has so declared. There is a difference of opinion among those opposed to the issue of circulation by the national banks in reference to the character of the Government notes. One class insists that the Government printed notes shall be made legal tender for all debts public and private, as represented by my colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRUMM;] while another class, represented by my colleague from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER,] insists that the Government notes shall be a legal tender only with the Government, which issues them, but shall not have that compulsory debt-paying power in the transactions of the people. While the latter proposition—treasury notes without legal-tender functions—is free from the constitutional objection which condemns the fiat money theory, yet both call for the retirement of bank notes and the substitution of Treasury notes.

Paper money in some form will be used. It is impossible to perform the business and to make the exchanges of the world without the use of some medium less cumbersome than coin. While coin is essential as a measure or standard of value, its use is trivial in amount when compared with the paper substitutes employed in these exchanges. Gold performs 1.38 per cent., silver .17 of 1 per cent., greenbacks and national-bank notes combined 4.36 per cent., and the balance, 94.09 per cent., of our monetary work is done most conveniently by bank checks and drafts. No trouble results from the use of these bank checks, because of their ready convertibility, and while not fortified with any legal-tender power there is property behind them which gives to them the credit to which they are entitled. To the extent of 4.36 per cent. of our monetary exchanges we need what is called paper money. In what form shall we have it? In my judgment it is better that this paper currency shall be issued by corporations under the control and supervision of the National Government rather than State governments, and with such limitations as will protect the public from loss, as will guarantee its prompt redemption, and will secure for it an uniform and certain value all over the country.

The redemption of national-bank bills can be enforced. The public debt back of them can be made available, the assets of the banks can be reached by law, and the shareholders can be forced to respond. Whether the redemption of Government or Treasury notes in times of social or political convulsions can be made as positive is questionable. When legal-tender notes can be multiplied indefinitely by the simple cost of engraving and printing is it possible to make adequate provision for their certain conversion and redemption at all times? It is said we can avoid any excessive issue by fixing the amount per capita so as to meet the exact demands of commerce. By whom and by what process is the precise quantity to be determined? Not by the laws of trade, but by the enactments of a constantly changing Congress. It does not wholly meet the question to say the ability of the Government is superior to that of the corporation. There must be willingness as well as ability. The value of government paper money depends not only upon the power but upon the integrity and prudence of the government which issues it.

The United States cannot be compelled by process of law, enforced through the courts, to pay its debts. Will the Government after it has provided the paper currency always take the steps necessary to keep it sound and convertible? Is there no danger that temptations and delusions may in times of extravagance or depression overcome the integrity and good sense of the majority of the people? The will of the majority in this country can be relied upon as safe, but were this the invariable rule we should not need the constitutional restrictions which experience has shown to be essential. I do not fear that the delusion which declares that a piece of paper stamped $1 is equal to 25.8 grains of gold with the same stamp, and which seeks by the despotic authority of law to create for it the same value and believes it can fulfill the same function in wiping out debt, will ever prevail with the majority in this country. But if the delicate function of supplying this paper currency is once committed to the Government, is there not danger that its volume may be made too large for its own safety or too small for the purposes of covenience and healthy business? The possibility of temptation and the consciousness that legislation may in some evil moment vitiate the currency will be a source of apprehension and trouble. If experience teaches anything, it is that contingencies arise which afford the pretext for and prompt the issue of Government notes until their redemption becomes impossible.

No such danger can possibly come from bank bills under a system of national regulations which makes their issue imperative upon absolute security, for the reason that any overissue must and will flow back for redemption, and that redemption will not depend upon the mere willingness of the bank which has issued them. The question of how much money the United States can save in interest by compelling its people to take its promises to pay without interest is insignificant when compared with the question of soundness and convertibility.

I shall not be expected to anticipate and comment upon all the wild and extravagant statements which the opponents of this bill may make in discussing it. Many of these statements are so completely at variance with official reports, and with the practical knowledge and experience of business men, that they require no refutation. They may influence certain constituencies where such political literature is welcomed, but they cannot influence the judgment of this House. I have an example before me in a speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WARNER,] printed in the RECORD of March 31. He says:

> The whole policy has been to centralize power and perpetuate monopolies. Think of it for one moment: twenty-two hundred banking associations, chartered and protected by the strong arm of the Government for a period of twenty years, are now knocking at the doors of Congress for charters of equal time, resting upon the bonds of the United States locked up in the Treasury, drawing from 5 to 6 per cent. interest in gold, making from 10 to 12 per cent. interest on the issue resting upon these bonds; pouring into these great rich institutions from 16 to 18 per cent. per annum—all done by the strong arm of the law; and yet these monopolists are freed from paying any interest to the Government thus protecting them.

It is hardly necessary to deny the assertion that the national banks receive from 16 to 18 per cent. per annum, when the sworn returns, compiled and published by the Comptroller, show a profit on capital and surplus of only 7.81 per cent. for 1880, and 9.15 per cent. for 1881, and which are the largest rates of earnings for a number of years; or to deny that the bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States to secure circulation are drawing 5 to 6 per cent. interest in gold, when every one knows the rate is only from 3½ to 4½ per cent.; or to deny that the banks are monopolies, when for years our banking laws have been free to all who chose to engage in the business, and no one man or corporation can have any special privileges not open to every man and every corporation.

The gentleman further says:

> Some twenty-two hundred banking corporations rest alone upon bonds, and yet with their 16 or 18 per cent. per annum they bear but a small part of the burdens of our United States, State, county, or corporate governments.

He cannot have read the figures of taxation, and yet they are accessible to him. I will not give the aggregate taxation paid by the banks, because the magnitude of figures sometimes confuses; but I will state the taxes paid by a single bank, the one previously mentioned, the First National Bank of Troy, New York, with a capital of $300,000. This bank has paid during eighteen years, from January 1, 1864, to January 1, 1882, for taxes, as follows:

City, State, and county taxes	$181,157 41
United States taxes	90,300 75
Total taxation	271,458 16

Which is an average of $15,081.02 per year, or 5.3 per cent. on its capital of $300,000. This is not an exceptional case, but is selected because the bank is of average capital and located neither in a great populous city nor in a country town; and yet we shall be told again and again during the debate upon this bill that the banks are monopolies protected by the Government, robbing the people, and paying no taxes.

The present national banking system has given the best satisfaction of the many we have tried. It combines the power of the Government with private enterprise. It secures the sagacity and prudence of individuals in the management of banking affairs, and is controlled by the wholesome restraints of positive laws and official supervision. It has proved itself an advantage to our industry and progress. If not perfect it is within our power to make it so. The refusal to pass this bill leaves the system to die by slow degrees. It forces into liquidation at the end of their charters two thousand two hundred banks, with loans amounting to $1,200,000,000. Nearly four hundred of them expire shortly. The operation of liquidation involves serious disturbances to every description of business: the calling in of loans, the contraction of the currency, the disarrangement of exchanges. The features of the bill which we are considering are simple and reasonable. Until some better system of banking is presented it is the part of wisdom to continue this system, which gives and has given such general satisfaction.

Mr. BRUMM. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts several questions.

Mr. CRAPO. I propose to yield the balance of my time.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman's time, I have no doubt, will be extended.

Mr. CRAPO. I have promised to yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCK.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. I hope the practice of extending time will not be commenced in this debate at this late period of the session.

Mr. BRUMM. I desire to ask these questions at the beginning of the debate, and I think they may have the effect of shortening it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I ask that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] be allowed to ask the questions, and that this shall not be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Iowa.) To whom does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. CRAPO. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCK.]

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House is a bill "to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence." It is, therefore, a proposition to prolong the policy of the Government in regard to banks for another period of twenty years. The bill proposes no new policy, no new principle. It accepts the results of a trial of twenty years as being satisfactory, and proposes to leave the system substantially unmolested.

At the commencement of the civil war the Government found itself subjected to enormous expenses hitherto unknown in its history. Armies were to be recruited and equipped for active service, the Navy built up, and these in addition to the ordinary expenses of the Government. The Government at once became a large borrower of money. There was no uniform national currency. The Government endeavored to carry on the war by negotiating loans, as in the war of 1812. The only banks in existence were those chartered under State laws. Many of these came forward and loaned the Government large sums of money for present necessities. The States themselves assumed a large portion of the expense of equipping regiments during the early part of the war, and raised money by borrowing from the State banks. These expenses have been from time to time repaid by the General Government, and many claims growing out of money so advanced by the States are still pending.

It cannot be denied that if the General Government had been obliged to advance the money necessary to carry on the war in 1861 and 1862, and the State governments, backed by the State banks, had come forward and patriotically advanced the money great embarrassment would have followed. As the war progressed it became evident that a national debt of vast amount must be one of its results. The first loan after the commencement of the war was under authority of the act of July 17, 1861, which authorized the issue of $250,000,000 in bonds, with interest at 7 per cent., and $50,000,000 of Treasury notes without interest. This loan was followed by others during the years 1861 and 1862.

The obligations of the General Government were rapidly increasing, and its expenses exceeded its revenues by many millions.

The expenses of the Government for war purposes connected with the Army for five years were as follows:

1861	$23,001,530 67
1862	389,173,562 29
1863	603,314,411 82
1864	690,391,048 66
1865	1,030,690,400 06

Expenses of the Navy:

1861	$12,387,156 52
1862	42,640,353 09
1863	63,261,235 31
1864	85,704,963 74
1865	122,617,434 07

The Government, in order to meet these extraordinary expenses, of necessity became a large borrower in the money market. On January 8, 1863, the Ways and Means Committee reported a bill providing for the issue of $900,000,000 in 6 per cent. bonds, $300,000,000 in Treasury notes at 5.47½ per cent., and $50,000,000 in fractional currency. It is a significant fact, also, that this bill authorized a tax on the issue of the State banks above a certain percentage of their capital. It would seem from the proposition to tax the State banks, as provided for in the bill, that Congress then intended to enact such hostile measures by way of taxation as would have the effect of driving the State banks out of existence, and thus prepare the way to have the national banks substituted for them.

A tax of 10 per cent. was afterward placed on the amount of notes of any person or of any State bank used for circulation, and such is the present law.

While the above bill was pending, and before any action was taken upon it, the national-bank act was reported, and on February 25, 1863, it became a law. On March 3, 1863, just six days after, the bill authorizing loans amounting in the aggregate to $1,250,000,000 also became a law.

Thus Congress by one act authorized by far the largest loan of the war, and by the other created a market for its own bonds, established a uniform national currency, drove the State banks out of existence, and substituted for them national banks, whose circulation depended on their loaning the Government what it needed to carry on the war.

It is thus clear that the national-bank act grew out of the necessities of the Government, and that Congress by passing it conferred a greater favor on the Government than it did on those banks that were satisfied to continue business under State laws, but were compelled to receive a franchise from the Government, containing some valuable privileges, it is true, but burdened with excessive taxation.

In the case of Veasie Bank vs. Fenno, 8 Wallace, page 536, Chief-Justice Chase, in giving the opinion of the court, said:

> The necessities of adequate provision for the financial exigencies created by the late rebellion suggested to the administrative and legislative departments of the Government important changes in the system of currency and taxation which had hitherto prevailed.

The title of the act indicated its purpose. It was "an act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof."

This continued to be the name of the act until June 20, 1874, when it was changed to that of "the national-bank act."

As indicated by its original name its purpose was to provide for a currency that should be national, and to provide for the circulation and redemption of that currency. It was the United States whose interests and great needs were kept uppermost in framing the bill. The banks were made the mere servants of the General Government and were compelled to do duty in circulating and receiving a currency which was to be national in its character.

The provisions of the act are well calculated to secure a safe and uniform currency. Any number of natural persons, not less than five, may form the association, with a capital of not less than $100,000, except in places with a population of less than 6,000, when the capital may, with the consent of the Comptroller, be not less than $50,000. One-third of the capital stock paid in must be invested in United States bonds. Ninety per cent. of the market value of these bonds is given to the association in circulating notes. It will be seen that the Government has no responsibility for these notes, but it holds the bonds as a trustee for each bill-holder. The title of these bonds is indeed in the banks, but that title is subject to the lien of the Government upon them as such trustee.

By this wise provision every genuine national-bank bill is equal to good money wherever found. The bonds of the United States are behind it, and its circulation is as boundless as the great Government whose bonds secure it.

An additional security is found in the provision that each stockholder shall be personally responsible for all contracts, debts, and engagements of such associations to the extent of the amount of their stock therein in addition to the amount invested in such shares. This has by some been considered as a great hardship, and it has prevented many persons from investing their money when such an extraordinary liability was incurred. Whatever may be said by way of objection to it, it must be conceded that this provision, together with the security provided for by the deposit of bonds, furnishes an iron-clad security for the bill-holders and general creditors which is unsurpassed in the financial legislation of the world.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WARNER] in his discussion of this question the other day made use of the following language:

> So it is clear from our Constitution that the only power to coin or make money, to regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and to fix a standard of weights and measures rests with Congress, and is a legislative power, and that this power can be delegated to no corporation or body by Congress, but must be exercised alone by Congress, being the only legislative body of the United States.

The gentleman from Tennessee is not alone in his view of this clause of the Constitution. It is the position taken by most of the objectors to the present national-bank system.

Among the objections urged against an extension of these charters is one that goes to the fundamental right of Congress to delegate the powers given to the banks under the provisions of the original act, and which in the bill under consideration are extended for a period of twenty years.

It is claimed that Congress alone has power to issue money, regulate the volume of the currency, lay taxes, &c., and that Congress can only exercise this power directly, and that when it delegates the power to issue money to such association as may be formed under the act it is acting outside of the grant of power found in the language of the Constitution. In short, it is claimed that Congress cannot charter a bank, with the privilege of issuing and circulating its obligatory promissory notes (bank bills) as money, although secured by the requisite amount of United States bonds, for the reason that while Congress has itself the power to issue money and put it in circulation by its own fiat, no portion of that power can be delegated to a banking association, however carefully guarded.

It will be conceded that the Constitution is a grant and not a limitation of power. The people granted to the General Government certain general powers, enumerated in the Constitution and expressed in the most general terms. The powers expressly granted are few in number, but the powers which by that instrument went from the people to the General Government by implication include all such powers and rights as are necessary to the complete exercise and enjoyment of all the powers enumerated in the general grant, and are coextensive with the power of the Government to maintain its own sovereignty and to "provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

The power of Congress to charter national banking associations grows out of article 1, section 8, of the Constitution. Section 8 provides that (1) "the Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;" (18,) "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."

In 1791 Congress exercised the implied power found in this article and chartered the Bank of the United States, with the privilege of doing business for twenty years, with a capital of $10,000,000, of which the United States was to subscribe for $2,000,000, and with the power to establish branch banks in various parts of the country.

Washington, who was then President, asked the opinion of Jefferson and Hamilton as to the power of Congress, under the Constitution, to pass such an act.

Jefferson contended that the construction of this section was that Congress could only lay taxes, &c., for the purpose of providing for the general welfare, and that the powers specified in the article could be "carried into execution without a bank," and that "a bank therefore is not necessary and consequently not authorized by this phrase."

Hamilton opposed this construction, and contended—

> First. That the power of the Government as to the objects intrusted to its management is in its nature sovereign.
>
> Second. That the right of erecting corporations is one inherent in and inseparable from the idea of sovereign power.
> Third. That the position that the Government of the United States can exercise no power but such as is delegated to it by its Constitution does not militate against this principle.
>
> Fourth. That the word "necessary" in the general clause can have no restrictive operation derogating from the force of this principle; indeed, that the degree in which a measure is or is not necessary cannot be a test of constitutional right, but of expediency only.
> Fifth. That the power to erect corporations is not to be considered as an independent and substantive power, but as an incidental and auxiliary one, and was, therefore, more properly left to implication than expressly granted.
> Sixth. That the principle in question does not extend the power of the Government beyond the prescribed limits, because it only affirms a power to incorporate for purposes within the sphere of the specified powers.

It will thus be seen that these eminent men differed widely in their construction of this clause. The opinion of Hamilton prevailed, and Washington signed the bill; and thus the first national-bank act became the law of the land. Jefferson himself, when President, signed an act extending the privilege to the bank to establish a branch bank in the Territories. It continued to do business until the expiration of its charter in 1811. On April 10, 1816, the second "Bank of the United States" was chartered by Congress, with powers similar to the first. It could establish branch banks in any part of the country. Its capital was $35,000,000, one-fifth in cash and the balance in United States 6 per cent. stocks. It was also made the custodian of the public funds. It was not rechartered.

The State of Maryland having attempted to tax a branch of this bank which had been established in that State, the validity of the tax was questioned and the case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the clause of the Constitution now under consideration received a judicial construction. (McCulloch vs. Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 316.) Webster appeared as one of the counsel for the Government.

Chief-Justice Marshall, in giving the opinion of the court, said:

> Among the enumerated powers we do not find that of establishing a bank or creating a corporation. But there is no phrase in the instrument which, like the Articles of Confederation, excludes incidental or implied power; and which requires that everything granted shall be expressly and minutely described.
>
> The Government, which has a right to do an act, and has imposed on it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means; and those who contend that it may not select any appropriate means, that one particular mode of effecting the object is excepted, take upon themselves the burden of establishing that exception.
> The power of creating a corporation is never used for its own sake, but for the purpose of effecting something else. No sufficient reason is therefore perceived why it may not pass as incidental to those powers which are expressively given, if it is a direct mode of executing them.

We have already shown the object aimed at by Congress in passing the original act, and under the decision above quoted the conclusion is irresistible that the chartering of national banks, as provided for in the act of 1863, was within the implied powers granted to Congress, as a means by which that body could exercise the power which by the Constitution had been expressly granted to it. See, also, the case of Van Allen vs. Assessors, 3 Wallace, 573, (1865,) in which the court held the national-bank act to be constitutional.

Under the provisions of the original act the banks are compelled to render to the Government a strict account of all their business, and also to perform certain services. They were to loan the Government one-third of this paid-up capital, and thus aid the Government in finding a market for its bonds.

Will any one say that the constant demand on the Government on the part of the banks for bonds to secure circulation did not directly tend to enable the Government to negotiate its loans at a lower rate of interest than would have been the case had no such great market been created. Many millions of dollars have thus been saved to the Government which are not taken into account by those who oppose the present system. They are also to pay to the Government a tax on their circulation, deposits, and capital. In addition to this they act as depositories of the public funds.

It cannot be denied that the national banking system has greatly improved the currency of the country. Nearly all of the banking institutions of the country in existence at the time of the passage of the act changed their State organizations and adopted the national system. It thus became national in its character from the very first, and the currency thus placed in the hands of the people was in strong contrast with the fluctuating, variable, and dangerous issue of paper money which constituted the circulating medium just before the war. The Western States had suffered greatly from a depreciated currency, and derived great advantages from the new system.

From the commencement the banks have been subjected to taxation. The rate of taxation is now as follows: on circulation, 1 per cent.; on deposits, one-half of 1 per cent.; on capital, one-half of 1 per cent.

A large revenue has been derived from this source, the aggregate and the amount in detail being shown by the following figures, taken from the report of the Treasurer of the United States:

Semi-annual duty assessed upon and collected from national banks by the Treasurer of the United States for the fiscal years from 1864 to 1881, inclusive.

It is claimed that extravagant profits have accrued to the national banks from the system, and that it ought to be abolished for that reason.

The following figures, taken from Comptroller Knox's report, shows the capital, dividends, and total earnings of the national banks for each half year, from March 1, 1869, to September 1, 1881:

It will be seen from this exhibit that the claim often put forth by the new school of financial philosophers that the banks are getting rich by robbing the people has not the slightest foundation in fact. For the six months ending September 1, 1881, the ratio of dividends to capital and surplus was only 3.33 per cent. During the period of time covered by these figures the Government itself was paying a greater average rate of interest on its bonds than the amount of these dividends, and it would have been far more profitable, at least from 1875 to 1879, when surplus declined, for the banks to have closed their doors, bought Government bonds, and divided the interest on them among their stockholders. However, the robbing process seems to have gone on with the net result to the banks of about 4 per cent. on the amount of capital and surplus.

Under the provisions of the act each association must keep on hand 15 per cent. of their deposits and notes in circulation as a reserve fund, not to be reduced by dividends, &c.; and in certain cities named in the act 25 per cent. is required to be set aside for the same purpose. The amount held in reserve under this provision of law amounted on June 30, 1881, to $126,679,518. This sum constitutes a safety fund for these institutions, which cannot be divided to stockholders, and can only be drawn upon in case of embarrassment growing out of large and unforeseen losses.

In connection with this claim of extravagant profits it may be well to further consider the question of taxation. I have already shown the amount paid by the banks to the United States in taxes. They also pay tribute to the States. The amount paid to the United States and to the States is shown by the following figures, taken from the last annual report of the Comptroller:

According to these figures the amount paid last year was $15,994,925, over 4 per cent. on the average circulation of the banks. Complaint is often made that the banks receive 90 per cent. of the amount deposited with the Treasurer in bonds of the United States in circulating notes, for which they give nothing in return, thus creating a monopoly; but the fact is clearly shown by these figures that the banks pay a greater tax on their circulation than they receive in interest from the Government on the bonds deposited to secure that circulation.

According to the last report of the Comptroller—

The banks now hold $31,981,650 of 4½ percents, and $92,005,800 of 4 per cent. bonds. They hold also $3,486,000 of Pacific Railroad bonds, and $758,000,900 called bonds on which interest has ceased. The remainder, $245,601,050, consists of bonds bearing interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. The average interest now paid by the United States upon the bonds deposited as security for circulating notes is about 3.7 per cent. upon their par value.

The following table shows the amount of these bonds held by the Treasurer November 1, 1881, and the rate of interest:

Class of bonds.	Authorizing act.	Rate of interest.	Amount.

In addition to the other service performed by the national banks for the General Government they have acted as depositories of the public funds to the amount of $3,669,461,046.61, the amounts in each year being shown by the following figures taken from Treasurer Gilfillan's last report:

The Government, in return for what it receives from the banks, gives them two things: first, a corporate franchise; second, a circulation equal to 90 per cent. of the market value of its own bonds, which secure that circulation.

It will be seen from the foregoing that the Government has derived quite as much from the banks as it has bestowed upon them.

No well-defined system has yet been suggested by the opponents of the national-bank system as a substitute for it. Some of its critics and opposers would have the Government itself engage in the business of banking and issue fiat money for use in the business transactions of the people, its volume to be regulated in some way not yet clearly defined. Government postal savings-banks have been suggested, in which laboring people may deposit their savings and receive a low rate of interest, and the cool suggestion is made that the Government would derive a great profit from the use of the money so deposited. To enact and enforce laws for the regulation of business is undoubtedly one of the functions of Government. It is clearly the duty of Congress to regulate and guard the business of banking so that those who engage in it and thereby have the management of vast sums of money shall not oppress the people. No one will object to the most stringent measures looking to this end. This is as far as the Government should go. It should guard, protect, and encourage business, and not take it into its own hands. The less interference on the part of the Government with any kind of business save to make it safe for business men to engage in it the better.

It has been claimed that inasmuch as the national debt, which is the basis and security of the circulation, is being rapidly paid off, the system will fail for want of something to secure the circulation. The question suggested by such a claim is not now before us for decision. The Government has never been free from debt, and probably never will be. It certainly will not be during the term named in the bill. If the time should come when the Government bonds should become unavailable as a basis of circulation, then the only question to be solved would be how to secure the circulation. If that question was now before us it might be suggested that Government bonds are not the only safe securities to be found in the United States, and that some other security for the circulation, to be approved of by the Government, might be substituted which would render it as safe as when secured by Government bonds.

The bill before the House ought to have received favorable action earlier in the session. Although it is true that new associations can be formed by the stockholders of the banks when their charters expire, yet there are innumerable difficulties connected with such a course growing out of the rights of non-assenting stockholders to their share of the assets, the laws of some of the States forbidding the reinvestment of trust funds in any kind of bank stock except at the risk of the trustee so investing, the difficulty of obtaining the consent of all the stockholders, and others that will readily suggest themselves.

If the present Congress should refuse to extend these charters, it would be understood as indicating hostile legislation hereafter, and those banks whose charters expire before February 25, 1883, anticipating unfriendly action on the part of Congress, would go into voluntary liquidation, retire their circulation, amounting to nearly sixty-eight millions and a capital of forty-two millions, and either abandon business altogether or organize under State laws. This is no fancy picture. The delay in the consideration of this bill and the hostility shown toward it on the floor of this House have caused the greatest solicitude and uneasiness in the business centers of the country; and capital, always alert, shy, and apprehensive, shares in the general fear. In the State of Connecticut one bank, at New London, has gone into business under the State law rather than continue longer as a national corporation. Another, the Phœnix National Bank of Hartford, has recently obtained a charter from the Legislature of that State, and another financial institution, the United States Trust Company of Hartford, rather than organize under the national system, has obtained a charter to do business as a bank under State authority.

The national banks have been the successful agents of the Government in establishing and maintaining a safe, convenient, and uniform currency. The opponents of the system have suggested no better plan. They would substitute the untried and speculative for the tried and substantial. It would be the height of legislative folly to follow this advice and set aside a system which, growing out of the exigencies of the war, contributed in a large measure to the relief of the Government in that trying period of its history, and for twenty years has been found equal to the wants of a prosperous and growing country.
